HALIBUT FISHING

The Washington trawling fleet that landed 75 per cent of the halibut caught by net gear on the Pacific coast in 1943, itself formally petitioned the Commission to prohibit the retention of halibut caught by trawls of any description. Its members maintain that efforts to secure halibut with otter trawl would lead to the use of fishing devices very destructive to the bottom and injurious to the supply of halibut and of other bottom species. They also maintain that their present orderly system of contract marketing, which minimizes waste and maintains the quality of the catch, will be jeopardized if trawling for halibut develops. They claim that relatively few halibut are found on good soles and flounder grounds and that practically all of these can be returned alive to the water if handled promptly.

The request of the Washington trawler fleet was supported by the International Fishermen and Allied Workers of America and by the halibut vessel owners and fishermen of both countries. The halibut fleets contend that it would be unjust to permit vessels using trawls or other types of gear to shift from unrestricted fisheries to the already overcrowded fishery that the longline halibut fleet alone has been instrumental in rebuilding.

The trawler and halibut fleets agree that in the interest of conservation of man-power and fishing equipment and for the maximum war-time production of good-fish, the otter trawl fleet should devote its activities, as at present, to the capture of the abundant species that no other types of gear can catch effectively.

The halibut regulations are based upon the results of biological and statistical investigations, carried out by the Commision's staff of expert fishery biologists. They are guided from year to year by current investigations of the effect of past regulations upon the conditions of the stocks of halibut.

The 1944 regulations are similar in most respects to those of last year. The coast is divided into the same four regulatory areas, of which Area 1 lies south of Willapa Harbor, Washington; Area 2, between Willapa Harbor and Cape Spencer, Alaska; Area 3, between Cape Spencer and the Aleutian Islands and Area 4, along the Aleutian Islands and in the Bering Sea. Limits are placed upon the total catch to be taken from Area 2 and from Area 3. The fishing season is opened in all areas at midnight of April 15 and will end in Areas 1 and 2 when the Area 2 catch limit is reached and in Areas 3 and 4 when the Area 3 catch limit is taken. Set-line vessels are permitted to retain one pound of halibut with each seven pounds of other species of fish caught incidentally during fishing for those other species for a limited period after closure of the area to halibut fishing.

The proposed halibut fishery regulations for the 1944 season have been approved by the President of the United States and the Governor General of Canada. These regulations apply to halibut fishing off the coasts of northwestern United States, western Canada and Alaska.

The Commission was established by treaty between the two nations to see what could be done to rebuild the stocks on the halibut banks of the North Pacific. These banks had been so severely over-fished that it had become hardly worth while for the halibut fishermen to go out any more. Since the Commission was granted power to regulate the fishery, the stocks on these northwest banks have been developed until they now afford the finest halibut fishing anywhere in the world. The work of this Commission is an outstanding example of what can be accomplished by practical international cooperation.

The Commission consists of four members, two from each country. Present members are G. W. Nickerson, of Prince Rupert, Charles E. Jackson, United States Fish and Wildlife Service, Washington, D.C., W. A. Whitmore, of the Canadian Department of Fisheries, Ottawa, and Edward W. Allen, Seattle, Washington. Mr. Nickerson and Mr. Allen are chairman and secretary, respectively, for 1944 and 1945.
