Warnings of White Fishermen That Japanese Were Making Surveys of Coast Went Unheeded for 20 Years — Post-war Fishermen's Patrol Urged

Those whose livelihood is made by following the sea were perhaps the first to warn Canadians against the Japanese who spread all up and down this coast and claimed they were humble fishermen.

Legitimate fishing boats chugging into remote inlets repeatedly came upon Jap "fishermen" toying with a single line. It was not long before the white men began to suspect the cocky little men of the Land of the Rising Sun were taking thousands of soundings along our coast and completing a survey.

White fishermen for years before the present war broke out repeatedly drew attention to the fact that Japanese youths would suddenly disappear and reappear as mysteriously in a few years time. They gave no satisfactory answer to questions but the white fishermen suspected the youths had been called to the homeland for military training.

Today we realize that our white fishermen were alive to the real situation as it existed. We realize and understand now how many a Japanese, despite several poor seasons, was able to buy himself large and efficient boats, while the white men were having a tough time.

Japan, it is evident now, thought it worth her while to subsidize her people by providing them with boats. She received in return full reports and records of this coast.

Following the last war, the Canadian government turned down a suggestion that a number of patrol boats be sold at a low price to service men wishing to continue their fishing life after demobilization. This idea was discarded.

Could not this program of providing boats be advanced when peace comes again? Could not the fishermen of the coast be recognized as an active reserve fleet making periodic reports on their respective districts? For, remember, history repeats itself.

When Duty Calls Don't Fail Ever
Men of the sea are a determined people. They want what they want when they want it, and heaven help those who are in their way or have failed in their duty.

The Daily News reporter—in the eyes of the crew of a large vessel that makes scheduled calls at our Sunset Port—failed in his duty, and they told him about it.
