Election Coming Up...

The federal election campaign is all but joined been obtained from a reputable well signify that their donations way perhaps that's one of with Prime Minister Mackenzie King's announcement that parliament will be dissolved before July 1, 1945, and the further statement that an election will be held either this year or next year. Of course, the remark of the premier to this effect involves no particular surprise since, at the utmost, the normal life of this parliament could not have been far beyond July 1, 1945, in any case. The statement of Mr. King may be taken by political observers as lending strength to the belief that an election may not be many months removed from now.

As a diversion from the war, political talk will for a time now become a more absorbing topic than it has been. Possibly the earlier the election the better so that the air may be settled.

It appears now that it may be a fight between the Liberal government, strong in experience of wartime administration but suffering from the political disadvantages that usually accrue from a long term of office under difficult conditions, and the rising Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, without record to either praise or condemn but offering blandishments which, even if inconsistent, may prove attractive to a large number of voters.

Dangerous Streets...

An unfortunate traffic accident occurred in Prince Rupert yesterday resulting in the death of a 22-month-old child. Without implying any comment on the circumstances of this particular incident, it might not be out of place to use the occasion to allude to present conditions on city streets due to heavy traffic. There are greater dangers here today than ever before, dangers which make imperative the exercising of the utmost care and watchfulness by all who use the streets. Possibly, we are fortunate, under the conditions existing, that there have not been more serious accidents.
