However, in spite of the intervention order, efforts of London and Washington to end the strife have not yet become effective. The Paris radio said today that there has been no fighting in Labanon but that the situation in Syria remains unchanged.

The two Levant states, both members of the United Nations, resent French troops in their countries. Both Britain and the United States are supporting the independence of the two countries. The French claim that they need bases in the Levant for their own security and for the war against Japan.

Today at Washington President Truman approved Great Britain's intervention in Syria and the United States Department of State has sent a note to France requesting that the stand toward Syria and Lebanon be reviewed.
