Among projects proposed to the ministry of labor to help the problem of employing women, he said, was one to make domestic service more attractive by havling a union for domestics of better wages and better hours.

During the war, women have held all sorts of jobs and had little choice in the matter.

Those born from 1918 to 1923 were conscripted for either services or munitions work. Others were permitted to volunteer for services but were conscripted for industry with the women's land army as alternative. Whatever jobs they held, from bus conductresses to aircraft workers (and they were all compelled to hold some kind of a job unless they had children under 14 or were physically unfit) they were placed there by the ministry of labor. The spokesman explained:

"But if a woman refused to take any of the jobs offered we would direct her to one-serve her with legal notice advising her of the job and telling her to report at a certain place at a given time, or otherwise there would be a $450 fine and three months in prison."

Women physically unfit for such jobs as factory work, he said, were placed in other jobs, such as telephone operators or even bar maids, but this was all done through the ministry of #### final warning, "In August go he must."

"The garden is full of the sound of young birds," was the opening sentence of a late-July column. It told how a pair of goldcrests were feeding their young, "ranged neatly in a row along a fir bough and of an almost unbelievable smallness, tinier even than their parents but with much louder or more penetrating voices."

"The goldcrest's song is the merest whisper, its call-note a high-pitched 'see-see-see' - inaudible to many, but he must be deaf indeed who cannot hear the young goldcrests," said the
