But William and Marie Collins won't do that. In his divorce plea William accused his wife, whom he married four years ago after a two months romance, of wanting to spend too much money on "ciragettes and having a good time."

Marie says he accused her of flirting and leading a gay life. 'We still live together," she said, "but since he has stopped my money I do no cooking for him.'

"We have our own beds and to get his own back he often comes into my room and pulls the bedclothes off me."

After the hearing which was adjourned for a month, William asked Marie: "Come and have a drink, old dear," to which Marie replied:

"I'm damned if I will."
