Since the Eastern Arctic winter lasts from September to June, the Eskimo family lives the most of the time in the circular igloo made of blocks of hard snow The house, which takes only few hours to build, is changed every month or so. The home igloo is quite a sizeable affairpossibly ten feet or so in diameter. The small igloo, which is run up on the trail while travelling, can be erected in an hour. Into this the family crawls and, oblivious of the rest worries and responsibilities, the cares and strife, which mark the more enlightened form of civili-

But there is a brief summer in the Arctic when the tundracovered ground is actually seen. It is then that the Eskimo, his hard snow gone, makes for the shelter of himself and his family a tent—of caribou hides.

Primitive as the Eskimo aborigne may be, nevertheless, has his sense of a supreme beinga being for good and a being for evil. However, there is no evident appreciation of the spirit of good but the spirit for bad very seriously recognized and there is much concer nabout his appeasement.

The Eskimo may be subject to the ravage of disease and early death but he is an expert in the treatment of fracture and injury. He can skillfully stay the flow of blood and as adeptly splint a fracture so that the member is soon restored to full and uncrippled usefulness.
