for instance, ordinarily lose much of their bright green color in canning because chlorophyll, which give them color, is altered during the sterilizing process. Researchers found that by adding small quantities of chlorophyll to the peas, the natural color was preserved. The same process can be applied to other green vegetables such as asparagus and broccoli.

American Can Company also reports it has found a new way to can dehydrated milk and eggs which reduces the amount of oxygen to such a small amount that they will keep indefinitely, even at tropical storage temperatures, without turning rancid.
