Noted Scientist Believes United States May Assume High Place In World of Science

> By Adelaide Kerr Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK, July 27 (P)-The United States has a great chance to lead the post-war world in medicine and achieve the greatest national good health it ever nad, says Dr. Florence Sabin, one of America's most noted scien-

"The war has taught us that health is a national asset and so it now has become an outstanding objective. In the post-war world medicine, science, government and the people will be making a drive toward health that is greater than ever before and may well give this country the greatest national good health it has ever had."

Dr. Sabin, now 73, is called by some members of her profession "the greatest woman scientist in the United States." In Eight Place

"As a result of the attack on tuberculosis, the disease has shifted from first place as a killer to eighth place," she said. "This has not been brought about by really finding out how to control the disease, but by finding out how to prevent contagion. Now for some time we have been working on how to increase the resistance of the individual to contagion.

"In this research I was concerned with studying the effect on the body of different parts of the tuberculosis bacillus with the idea of seeing which part is the most destructive. My work covered the middle ground of a problem that is as yet unsolved -the problem of how the body builds up resistance to tubercuolsis. However, real progress has been made toward the solution in that we know a little better how to attack the problem than before."

Dr. Sabin was born in Central City, Colorada, graduated from Smith College, took her M.D. at John Hopkins in 1900—the first woman to graduate there. For the next 25 years she taught and did research at John Hopkins and then, in 1925, went to the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, much of which was made on the tuberculosis prob-

She was the first and only woman to be a full member of the Rockefeller Institute and of the National Academy of Sciences. She now holds honorary degrees from 13 universities and is the author of outstanding researches in anatomy and biology.
