Temptations of the Press . . .

The press is subject to certain temptations which it is necessary to recognize. A newspaper exists by making itself attractive to its readers and by providing news that interests them. And we cannot ignore the fact that war makes better news than peace, destruction better news than construction, antagonism better news than harmony. As a consequence a newspaper is naturally tempted to give tortion of news to which the public is cipal electors. entitled, but to the studied avoidance of the inflammation of public opinion, and with the constant and resolute aim of damping down suspicions and antagonisms rather than fostering them. To make a sensation out of inflamatory speeches or provocative acts they must not be made sensational because that simply makes a bad business worse; that way comes disaster. Nevertheless, the public demands the news.
