TOUGH WINTER ALONG COAST

Veteran Missionary, Rev. Peter Kelly, Had Never Seen More Severe Weather Along Coast

Rev. Peter Kelly, missionary-skipper of the United Church missionary boat Thomas Crosby, has navigated the waters of the northern British Columbia coast in season and out all his life but "this is the toughest winter I have ever seen," he told a Daily News reporter in describing consistent heavy storms, high seas, strong winds and blinding snowstorms. However, the devout missionary and his staunch craft have carried on their ministrations faithfully and it is few calls that have been missed despite the severity of the weather which has tested navigating ingenuity of the skipper and seaworthiness of his staunch craft.

One call, however, it has been impossible to make—that being upon George Corbett, lonely trapper in Khutze Inlet, a short distance below Butedale, where there is a six-inch thickness of ice, typical of the inlets on that part of the coast as a result of the severe frosts. It is two months since the Thomas Crosby has been able to get into Khutze Inlet. Spring winds, however, Mr. Kelly expects, will soon be breaking up the ice. It is many years since these inlets have been so thickly frozen.

Mr. Kelly, who came north to attend sessions of the United Church Presbytery here last week, visited Port Simpson yesterday and returned to the city today. He will leave Wednesday for his base at Ocean Falls, making missionary calls enroute at such points as Hartley Bay.
