Labor Government and Strike

ABORITE, socialistic or nationalist as it may be, it is to be noted that the Attlee government in Britain is no more disposed to trifle with illconceived strike action than have administrations in other countries which have no profession whatever toward being labor governments. On the other hand, with typical British courage and determination, there has been a minimum of hesitation in threatening "strong military measures" to break the transportation tie-up caused by the truck drivers' strike and to get the country's food moving again. In fact, there appears to have been even less dalliance than there was, for instance, with the recent coal strike in the United States.

Of course, there will be little public support or sympathy as far as the public of Britain is concerned with the wildcat walk-out precipitated at such an inconvenient time and bringing about further inconvenience and hardship to the people already harried by shortages of ration. $t is gratifying to learn today that the strike may yet be settled without resorting to such drastic measures as calling out the forces.

Jones Act Possibilities Tightening Up

THE RESTRICTIVE CLAUSES of the Jones shipping act might be interpreted in the future to restrict travel by American tourists into Alaska on Canadian ships.

The act originally intended to prohibit shipment of freight originating in the U.S.A. to Alaska on Canadian or other foreign ships. In the past two years a few motorists have driven their cars to Prince Rupert and there taken them aboard Canadian National and Canadian Pcific vessels for trnsportation into Alaska. The customs service has allowed this practice under the theory that a car is baggage or personal property. But it is quite conceivable, if not probable, that when the time comes that many American tourists drive to Prince Rupert, then board a Canadian vessel with their cars for the ride through Southeastern Alaska to Haines, this situation may be changed. The American shipping interests that had the Jones act passed in the first place probably would object, and the Canadian ships would be forced to stop this practice.

. We do not know all the ramifications of the regulations involved, but this is certainly one matter to be investigated in Alaska as the transportation picture for the north is studied. Tourists will want to have a two-way high-. way system so they can travel north over the Alcan and go south over a ferry to Prince Rupert, thence driving to Vancouver. That process might prove to be legal under the

some time that the regulations governing health and accident insurance companies in British Columbia were due for a tightening up. There is, therefore, nothing surprising in the recommendations along these lines made in the reports of the Grimmett and Cowan commissions which were made public at Victoria yesterday. That legislation necessary to implement the proposals will be prepared and enacted with a minimum of delay is to be

The keynote of tre Grimmett report appears to be the premise that such organizations should be operated "in the interests of the members and not to the main advantage of Health and accident insurance machinery is, of course, advantageous to the public, providing the public gets a reasonable break and adequate protection which, the comprovince and complaints in regard to which led to the to investigate and report
