SHORT SPORT

Joe Cotton, 94, one of the oldest Negroes in Alberta, picks Joe Louis as the best of the heavyweights over the last 25 years—and has the experience to lend weight to his opinion. Cotton, known to Edmonton's sporting fraternity and to thousands of others as "Ol' Joe," fought the great Jack Johnson in Denver in 1901.

"It was in Sacramento in 1899," he said in a birthday interview, "that a tough white man named George Gannon put me away after we had slugged it out for 61 three-minute rounds with only one-minute rests between." But the next time they met, the story was different. "I didn't like that beating," said Joe. "At the opening bell Gannon rushed me and in less than a minute I let go a left hook which knocked him out. I finished him quick, and we didn't have to work through another 61 rounds."

Joe was born in middle Texas, followed his father's trade as a blacksmith for several years, then in 1899 fought his first bare-knuckle fight at Joplin, Mo. "I met all comers and I didn't care nothin' for nobody," he said. "As a middleweight I fought as many heavies as middles—and I can still use my dukes if it comes down to that." Joe terms Bob Fitzsimmons a middleweight and said he regarded him as the best all-time fighter at that weight. "Fitz" later became a light-heavy and then a heavyweight champion.

Of the fight in which Jack Johnson was said through fear of possible intimidation and even death to have "faked" the loss of his championship to Jess Willard, Joe snorted: "I was at that fight. It was the biggest fake there ever was in the world. I saw Johnson lay down and put his hand over his eyes to keep the sun out. I could have licked Jess Willard myself that night; he was the poorest of all the heavyweights."

But Joe had a good word for Jack Dempsey, Joe Langford, Joe Gans and Henry Armstrong, who held three world championships in three weights at once. Joe was headlined with Billy Smith in San Francisco in 1892. The money gate totalled only $20,000, "but that was big money in those days."

Joe's recipe for longevity? "First you gotta be true to yourself. If you can be true to yourself, you can be true to everybody." He disapproves of women who smoke, drink and swear. He has outlived his wife and only

WILL PADDLE TO NEW YORK

Peter Burt, Now In Smithers, To Essay Adventurous Trip

SMITHERS.—Peter Burt, 27, the veteran with the "itchy" foot, just can't stay put.

Burt was born aboard the liner SS Mahene somewhere between Australia and New Zealand and traveled about the South Seas with his parents for many years.

Last year, the veteran nomad left Victoria bound for New York by canoe, but he turned back to spend the winter with his sister at Smithers.

Undaunted in spirit, Burt will make another canoe attempt to reach New York this summer. He will travel by ski from Ootsa Lake to Bella Coola, a distance of 100 miles, without a rifle.

Old-timers here said they never heard of anyone making such a skiing trip before. But Burt calmly declared: "I carried a rifle too long in the army."
