A Great Boost

FEVER A STRONG CASE was made out as to why Prince Rupert instead of Vancouver should be made the real administrative and supply centre for the industry and business of this great hinterland it is certainly done in the memorandum which has been presented to the Air Transport Board in support of Canadian Pacific Airlines application for a scheduled air service charter between here and Vancouver. We have been running this highly interesting and informative memorandum in successive installments of extracts and today we publish the section having particularly do do with Prince Rupert and the Queen Charlotte slands. It is therein that the submission is made that Prince Rupert is the supply centre for the Queen Charlottes and the Stewart mining area, that supply house subsidiaries should be shifted from Vancouver to Prince Rupert as the consumption centre and that financial risks involved in operation in this area would be greatly decreased if supplies and replacement parts were available here and not five hundred miles away at Vancou-

The memorandum further recognizes that "the area surrounding Prince Rupert is one of the richest in Canada in every necessary raw material for Friday. industrial activity."

If there were a main line air service into Prince Rupert, the memorandum asserts, "transfer of head offices of industries operating in the area to Prince Rupert (from Vancouver) would become entirely practical with consequent shift of population and increasing efficiency of direction."

Such statements as these fit in very well indeed with the new theory which was advanced here this week by Col. H. F. E. Smith, the new provincial industrial and trade representative from British Columbia to London, England, that it is time, in the economic interests of the country, that there was a decentralization from Vancouver to a second site and channel of trade, industry and traffic on this coast which would logically be here.

It is particularly significant that such admissions as these, which we have long advanced ourselves but like a voice crying in the wilderness, should now be spontaneously made in such a wayby a responsible trade representative of the government and by the subsidiary concern of Canada's second great transportation system which, so far at least, has never had much of a stake in these

It is all very encouraging for us to find support in such new quarters as these for the campaign which we have long been waging for recognition, p.m. development and on-the-spot exploitation of our resources and strategic economic position.

Cardinal Villeneuve

ARDINAL Jean-Marie Rodrigue Villeneuve, whose passing in Los Angeles is mourned, was born the son of a shoemaker but became a prince of the Roman Catholic Church before he reached 50, overcoming obstacles incident to humble birth by determination and devotion.

Successively college professor, superior, bishop and archbishop, he was elevated to the Sacred College of Cardinals by Pope Pius XI March 31, 1933. the fourth Canadian appointed to the cardinalate.

Known as a scholar of high literary attainment, His Eminence wrote numerous articles on religious philosophy and, after he became a cardinal particularly, evinced a keen interest in public affairs.

Referring to "separatism in Quebec," he said: "I believe that the more the Frenchspeaking people will be themselves, with their proper spirit and ancestral peculiarities, the more they will nourish in their hearts their deep, precious love for Canada. That is the only kind of separatism we teach."

During the Second Great War Villeneuve urged enlistment of Canada's young men in the armed forces.

"We are legally at war and we are bound to fight," he said in 1941. "That is why also it does not suffice to lend one's money. We are bound to contribute to victory by raising men and it is a national patriotic duty to supply this necessary contribution." Speaking to Canadian servicemen at Westminster Cathedral in London in September that year, Cardinal Villeneuve paid a special tribute to the fortitude of the British people under the onslaught of German bombers.

SNOW SQUALLS COVER CITY Weather Man in Prince Rupert Still Temperamental

Carrying on with his January tantrum, the Weather Man exploded an overnight combination of wind, hail and snow on the city that sent headgear flyinch of snow on city streets that had been cleared of snow by a thaw only a few hours earlier.

The wind, reported to have reached gale force in outside coastal waters, blasted at the city in gusts which reached peak velocity of 29 miles an hour from the southeast between ternoon.

Often the wind bore in with squalls of stinging hail which made pedestfian travel extremely miserable and which, during the night, covered the city with a fresh snow blanket an inch in in gusts this morning. The snow underfoot remained soft and wet, making so far no great hazard to motorists who are now conditioned to the worst that the Weather Man can offer.

Overnight temperature in the city was 31 degrees, mild enough. despite its one degree of frost, to keep the snow blanket from becoming dangerously frozen.

Local forecast today was for snow squalls, although it was not expected that the wind today would be as strong as on
