It went on for days. One by one the things for which men are indispensible were held up before my eyes and investigated thoroughly. The fires - who would light them? And if it dropped again to 28 degrees below zero in Prince Rupert (as has been reported) how could a mere woman keep the house warm? As for the garbage and getting it to the street, well-

Finally he got around to the biggest one. Won't you MISS me, if I go?" he asked sort of pathetically, I thought. Now, there was a stickler. What was I to say—and how? If I said 'No' he would leave absolutely crushed. But if I said 'Yes' as if I really meant it he was likely to rush | to the phone and cancel his reservation. I tried to steer for the middle. "Oh, yes-I'll miss you a bit, I suppose." Then changing the subject quickly, "Do you know, I finally threw out those old slippers of mine!"

All the same, I wasn't quite sure about anything until the subject of packing came up. It was early—three days early which left plenty of time for another relapse but somehow I felt that the struggle was over. It was the sad finality of tone that was most convincing, I think. That, and the fact that some gentlemen are never in a

The same is supposed to be true of a lady but I know of one at least whose packing can be made a speedy matter of minutes. The difference may lie in the things that are packed or it may be due to the popular trend that places comfort above style or at any rate attempts to combine the two.

Anyway, three days early, the brown cowhide bag came out of long hiding. With diligence worthy of the occasion, I folded up the long woollen legs, tucked in the arms and laid the garment in one corner. The socks went in another, pyjamas and
