Cordova Hits Crab Jackpot

Fisherman Reap Big Profit From Lucky Find

CORDOVA, Alaska, (AP) — Fishermen of this Alaska coastal town have struck a crab leg bonanza.

With their daily earnings running up into three figures, it looks as though the strike is as rich as any of the lucky oldtime sourdough's early day gold findings.

"A yarn that a couple of men were making $300 a day in a new placer gold strike would arouse terrific excitement," wrote Clarence Martin, Cordova Times publisher. "Yet the crab fishermen are making that kind of money — and it is just as good as if it came in nuggets."

Cordova is one of the big producers of canned and frozen crab. The species is known on the Pacific Coast as the Dungeness. But until recently all of the Cordova area catch was taken from Prince William Sound, adjacent to the town.

Because the Sound's crab beds always supplied enough of a catch to make a good living for the fishermen, few of them ever ventured outside.

It was during the closed season in the south that a venturesome fisherman decided about a month ago to try his luck in the Gulf of Alaska — the vast body of North Pacific water that washes the breadth of Alaska's southern coast.

He put out his traps and brought in a first day's haul of 3,000 crabs. A Cordova packing plant paid him 15 cents a crab — $450 for his day's efforts.

BIG CATCHES

Soon a half dozen fishermen were working in the same area, each with from 100 to 150 traps. After several weeks of fishing, the boats continued to bring in from 1,800 to 2,500 crabs each. Small boats are manned usually by a man and a boy, or by two men at most, so the daily take has been running $150 to $2... each.

Since the fishermen already had the traps for their Prince William Sound fishing, just about the only additional expense is for the bait and the boat operation.

The fishermen like it because they can leave early in the morning, run out to the gulf, pull their traps and be back in town by evening. The town likes it because it is the biggest flow of steady money it has seen for a long time.

The men and women who process the crab meat are making big pay cheques too. The packing plant crab "shakers" — they literally shake the meat from the shells — are the elite of the packing crews. A skilled "shaker" can remove about 450 pounds of meat a day. At 9½ cents a pound, that's $42.75 for a day's leg shaking.

The crab meat is either canned or quick-frozen in gallon cans and shipped to brokers in Seattle and San Francisco.

All this is happening in a season when the crab catch has been slim in such normally happy hunting grounds as Washington State coastal waters.

Happy Cordova fishermen believe they have tapped a vast storehouse of crab meat, and that they have only touched the edge.
