ly, and picked up pace as they moved along.

It isn't often that you hear of a 162-pound fullback on a team called upon to meet the country's best. But that was Elmer Layden's weight. Layden was no fullback to hit the line like a bludgeon. He was more the rapier type that struck with drizzy swiftness and held his feet as well as any 200-pound fullback you might see in action. Layden had run the 100 in less than 10 seconds, but it was his fast-lightning start that found even a half opening before it could ever close. Above all else he was the main point of danger against any hostile pass. Elmer proved this against a powerful Stanford team in the Rose Bowl of 1925.

The star in this big Stanford squad was big, blonde Ernie Nevers, one of the best of all time. Nevers, weighing 200 pounds, was the vital factor in the Stanford attack. But what both Pop Warner and Ernie Nevers overlooked was the speed and agility of Layden's forward pass defense. No matter where Ernie Nevers threw the ball in that Rose Bowl tilt, there was Elmer Layden on the wing, under the ball and on his way for touchdown runs. Layden was a pass-intercepting centipede that sunny afternoon in Pasadena as he covered almost every square yard of the defensive field.

Notre Dame's "Four Horsemen" might not have been the best backfield that football has ever seen. They lacked the offensive power and crash of Rockne's 1930 squad that knew Carideo, Savoldi, Schwartz and Marty Brill. They may not have been as good as Notre Dame's 1943 outfit with Creighton Miller, Bob Kelly and Bertelli—or the fast, powerful Army delegation of 1944 with Blanchard, Davis, Hall and Kenna. Not to overlook an old Carlisle avalanche that carried Thorpe, Calac and Guyon. But certainly, pound for pound, they stand alone. They had no need for any sheer power. When you consider such assets as speed brains, heart, alertness and rhythm, they had no equal.

After graduation Layden, Crowley and Stuhldreher all became successful coaches at Notre Dame, Fordham, Michigan State, Villanova, Wisconsin and Carnegie Tech, while Don Miller stuck to the law to find his place as a judge in Cleveland.

No member of the "Four Horsemen" could be named on an All-Time selection. But as a unit, as something to watch, they will long remain vivid in the memory of American football fans.

As some poet almost said:

"Of all the beautiful pictures
that hang on memory's wall,
That one of the old "Four Horsemen"—it seemeth the top of all."
