Yanks Close In On Seoul

As Communists Pour Reinforcements Into Fight To Stay Advance

TOKYO — While North Korea was pouring in reinforcements from north and west, United States Marines, having crossed the Han River, neared the heart of Seoul today after having concentrated on the capital city following their new invasion last Friday at Inchon. The Americans were closing in from two sides—one force from the northwest, the other from the southwest.

The city is not yielding without stubborn resistance. The United Nations forces will now consolidate their recaptured grounds to carry on further advances towards the thirty-eighth parallel.

There is every indication, however, that they will meet with increased resistance from the reinforced North Korean defensive forces.

The Red reinforcements are coming from Manchuria but whether they are Chinese Communists or Red-trained Koreans is uncertain.

As the Marines smashed on today, they were being slowed down and, at some points halted, by the big North Korean column rolling down from Manchuria to fight for the capital.

The armored column of doubtful nationality consisted of forty tanks and 200 other vehicles from Red China's Yalu River frontier in Manchuria. United States intelligence officers were endeavoring to determine its identity.

Many Red Koreans have fought in the north since the June 25 invasion across Parallel 38 were seasoned with Communist China's Manchurian armies. Their heavy equipment and planes were all of Russian manufacture.

The American Marines and their tanks entered Seoul from the northwest at 6 p.m. Wednesday while another column moved in from the west after seizing Seoul's airfield across the Han River.

Korean Red troops are converging on Seoul from several old Allied southeast beachhead the old Allied southeast beachhead perimeter.

A big battle for Seoul seems to be shaping up, a battle of deep significance if the force from Manchuria should turn out to be non-Korean in manpower. This mysterious force may already have crossed the 38th parallel, dividing North and South Korea and only thirty miles north of Seoul.

British troops in southeast Korea late today moved across the Nakdong River and joined American and South Korean forces pushing in to Kumchow.

Mr. Acheson referred to the fear of "invasion, subversion and the knock at the door at midnight" which was so general today.

The main obstacle today, he said, were the policies of the Soviet government of Russia with its new imperialism.
