COMMONWEALTH COMRADES—Servicemen of two Dominions serving under the United Nations flag got together on board H.M.C.S. Cayuga during the destroyer's visit to Tokyo. ## Eminent Church Visitor Is Here

Important ecclesiastical visitor in Prince Rupert this week will be Rev. Father Michael O'Ryan, assistant general of the Oblate Fathers of Mary Immaculate, who will be here in the course of an inspection tour of English-speaking Oblate houses in Canada. Father O'Ryan, whose headquarters are in Rome, is spending two months in Canada. Such a visitation as this is made about every six years.

Father P. Rayner, O.M.I., and Father O. P. Mohan, O.M.I., of Prince Rupert, drove today to the interior to meet Father O'Ryan at Terrace, where he spent the week-end, and will bring him on in here.

The visitor will be here for a few days before proceeding to Vancouver.

Doll Clothes Show Gets Historic Home

LONDON.—The famous collection of historical clothes and children's toys which used to be housed at the London Museum is being transferred to Kensington Palace, where Queen Victoria was born and Queen Mary lived for some years. One room in Lancaster House, next door to Princess Elizabeth's London home, is being set aside for children. Here a costly collection of doll's houses and toys will be on view. For mothers there is an exhibit of royal coronation robes and historical theatrical costumes.

AGED SWEDISH KING PASSES

which despite severe strains were maintained during both of the two World Wars. It was also an era of steady industrial expansion and deep going social reforms, which together greatly raised the living standard of the Swedish people.

King Gustaf had qualities which stood him in good stead as a ruler. An attitude of common sense stamped his whole approach—he had a realistic, clear eye for the essential significance of political events.

At a youth, he witnessed the rise of modern democracy and as a monarch he had to become adjusted to the new power of the common people which resulted from a broadening of the suffrage base. As chief executive he surrendered his constitutional prerogatives, but by yielding gracefully he was able to maintain the prestige of his throne. Blended with his realism was another trait which contributed much to his popularity—his keen, saving sense of humor.

Foreign policy and military affairs were his chief interests, and in these fields his personal influence was sometimes considerable, especially in critical situations.

From the strain between Sweden and Norway, which culminated in a peaceful dissolution of their union in 1905, King Gustaf received an important part of his early political education. At that time he was Crown Prince of both countries, and actually bore the brunt of the dispute, his father being aged and ailing. He had, however, the vision to see that in the long run it would be useless to resort to military means. On many subsequent occasions in political affairs he took the same conciliatory attitude which, however, was far from lacking in determination and firmness. As a monarch and the symbol of Swedish national unity, he gradually became a personification of the stability and continuity of his country's political development.

King Gustaf was born June 16, 1858. His father, King Oscar II, was a grandson of the first Bernadotte, a marshal of France under Napoleon and Prince of Ponte Corvo, who later became King of Sweden under the name of Charles XIV.

While still in his cradle, Gustaf received the title of Duke of Varmland. During his first 10 years he was trained at home by special tutors, but in 1868 he was enrolled in the private Beskow Day School in Stockholm, the first member of the Swedish royal house to attend classes with commoners in a preparatory school.

His marriage to Princess Victoria took place in Karlshuhe on September 20, 1881. The following year a son was born, the new King, Gustaf Adolf VI. A second son, who was given the name of Wilhelm and the title of Duke of Sodermanland, was born on June 17, 1884. A third son, Prince Erik, died at an early age. In her middle age, the queen's health began to fail. A respiratory ailment forced her to live in a warmer climate than that of Sweden and she spent the better part of many years at Capri or in Rome, where she died on April 4, 1930.

NO CORONATION

When, upon the death of his father, Crown Prince Gustaf became king on December 8, 1907, the 49-year-old ruler chose for his motto, "With the People for the Country." At the time of his ascension, he gave new evidence of his democratic nature by asking to have the traditional coronation ceremony omitted. When he was officially pronounced monarch in the Hall of the Realm in the Royal Palace, the time-honored insignia of his office were placed on a nearby table, while the ermine robe was draped over the back of the throne, instead of on the king's shoulders. The same arrangement has been repeated ever since at the annual openings of the Riksdag, at which the king delivers his address from the throne, which is, in effect, the government's program and report on the state of the nation. This King Gustaf continued to do for 42 years, but at the ceremony on January 11, 1950, he felt too weak to attend, and his oldest son, Crown Prince Gustaf Adolf, read the address, standing beside the throne.

As "Mr. G.," King Gustaf was widely known for his participation in many sports, especially tennis. From his first visit to England in 1878 he brought back a keen liking for "the white sport," which he helped to introduce and popularize in Sweden and which he reluctantly gave up only a few years before his death. Hunting was another game in which he showed great persistency and accuracy. Finding pleasure in shooting moose, hare, and game birds, he was one of the strongest advocates of strict game laws in the country. Fishing from an open dory was another of his diversions. He also liked motoring.

King Gustaf's interest were quite varied. Music delighted him enormously for many years he was a patron of the Academy of Music, and he regularly attended recitals in the Concert
