SLIDE VICTIM IS IS UNDER AGAIN

Abe Quinn survived burial in the winter's biggest snowslide on the lower Skeena last week but the reaction got him down.

The 40-year-old bulldozer operator, who was brought here by special train Thursday afternoon for medical treatment after a snowslide buried him near Kwinitsa, appeared in police court and pleaded guilty to a charge of drunkenness. He was fined $10 by Magistrate W. D. Vance.

He was picked up by the city police Thursday night when he was found wandering about a downtown business block and placed in the cells.

"I wish I had stayed in hospital," Quinn said ruefully. He could not recall the events of the evening, he told the court.

Quinn was released from hospital late Thursday afternoon, a few hours after being brought here for treatment for face and head injuries suffered when a snowslide buried him and his snow-clearing bulldozer.

The snowslide which buried him was said to be the biggest to come down on the railway line this winter. He was clearing snow from along the line, three miles west of Kwinitsa when it began to move at 9 o'clock yesterday morning.

Quinn saw the slide coming and headed his machine in the direction of its movement, hoping that it would come down behind him. However, it buried him in about eight feet of snow. His cries for help were heard through a crack in the snow.

The cab of the bulldozer provided him with sufficient air to stay conscious and he was able to cut a hole in the snow for further air, while workmen were digging him out, a two-hour operation.
