POLICE RADIO

"Something to do with theft," said Constable Turner, who had not taken time to get all the facts. It was Constable Redhead's case.

The cruise had just begun again when a call came through to go to a beer parlor. There, they found the disturbance over. A waiter had just put out an Indian who had tried to take on a little refreshment.

A disturbance report from Coy Bay was telephoned to the police office and relayed to the van which was then at Seventh Street. The call was made by a man from a neighbor's home, just after the owner of the telephone had gone to bed. Interested he decided to get up and see what was doing. He got on the scene three minutes after the police.

The call did not amount to much. Merely a woman taking her husband to task—highly vocally—for drinking too much. The neighbor had believed someone was being killed.

A BIG HELP
The calls kept coming in—none of them particularly big, but all of them adding to enforcement of orderliness in the city and to the labors of those whose job it is to keep things in line. And in that way, the radio is turning out to be a big help.

Installed last week by Wilfred Conlan, Victoria, chief radio supervisor, B.C. Police, the frequency modulation set is of a type standard in all radio cars in the force. In the south, literally dozens of cars are connected to the same circuit. Indeed, it is not until a large number of cars are operating on such a circuit that the greatest relative efficiency is achieved. But the fact that at present it is only a two-way hook-up here does not mean that its installation has not been a forward step.

"If we had had that radio hook-up when the 'prowler' was around here a couple of years ago, we would have caught him in short order," Sgt. Potterton said. "It was poor communications that beat us on that."

As an investment in safety, its cost is not high. Cost of installation was borne by the city, but maintenance will be charged to the police force, so that under the present contract between the force and the city, at least, the community will not have to pay a great deal extra.

Said one bystander as he watched the police van pull up to a disturbance within minutes after it started: "Boy those fellows can sure get here in a hurry."

The answer lies in four small metal boxes, two in the police office and two in the van, in which science and technical skill have allied themselves on the side of law and order.
