BIG COUNTRY

Ours is a big country.

Many and varied are the tasks of harnessing its strength to provide more and better jobs for more people.

This is the job of big business.

There used to be a widespread belief that big business confined its rewards to a very few. Today, large corporations are generally made up of many stockholders whose invested savings make possible greater projects than would be possible if each worked independently.

Its affairs are managed by employee-executives, trained from the ranks, for the job.

Theirs is the responsibility of making the business successful—of acting in the best interests of employees, shareholders and customers.

One of the basic conclusions business management has arrived at is that there must be balance. Employees must be fairly paid and be assured good working conditions; investors must receive a fair return on their savings, and customers must be given fair prices for the goods or services they buy.

The worker has his responsibility, too. His is to pool his ability and skill, as the investor pools his savings, to develop within this big country of ours even more and bigger jobs.

These views are presented in this newspaper by the British Columbia Federation of Trade and Industry. O-16
