BUSY AT WORK—A lot of people already accustomed to pictures of the Marquess of Milford-Haven On-The-Town with young ladies in the news, are in for a bit of a shock. Criticized roundly by certain members of the press who cite his night-clubbing as a bad example of Englishmen abroad during this period of austerity at home, Milford-Haven has insisted that he is in the U.S. as a salesman for a heating equipment manufacturer. He is shown above in the process of selling heating equipment to a customer. File that with your pictures of Milford-Haven with Sharon Douglas, daughter of U.S. Ambassador to Britain, and actress Peggy Maley.

FORMER GOV'T HEAD LOOKS BACK ON HAPPY LIFE

OTTAWA—"I feel as good as I did at thirty," said Mackenzie King, in an informal interview here. The former Prime Minister was 74 this month, and looking back over his life, said he found it "a very happy one."

Political life had been good to him, and had opened the doors of friendship in all parts of the world. "I have enjoyed the years," he commented. If I had them to live over again, there are some things I would have done differently, but I would still choose public service."

He now is taking life easier, but this is not so simple. "I find it a little difficult at first," said the former premier. "It is hard to break a life-time habit of constant pre-occupation with one's work and responsibilities. Now that I am feeling strong and vigorous again I think I should be doing something useful. But I am going to

Weekend Transport Strikes Loom In Britain Over Wage Demands

By STUART UNDERHILL
Canadian Press Staff Writer

LONDON—Increased hours of leisure for British working men mean extra toil for bus drivers and the drivers are beginning to grumble about it.

London bus drivers are demanding they be paid overtime for Saturday afternoon work. Despite stern warning by the Transport and General Workers' Union, they are talking of striking every Saturday afternoon if they don't get them.

The final decision will be taken this week. If the drivers carry out their threat it means millions of Londoners will have to walk or use other forms of transport to get to Saturday afternoon football games, concerts, movies and parties.

DRIVERS OVERLOADED
The very fact there would be such widespread dislocation is the mainstay of the argument of the drivers. They contend that the five-day week has given Britons so much spare time in which to gallivant around that it has placed an exhausting load on bus services.

The London Transport executive refuses to accept this argument. It says bus services are meant to run continuously and the drivers know that when they enter employment. Anyway, they say that an increase in wages might make it necessary to increase fares with a corresponding rise in the cost of living.

This argument leaves the drivers cold. It has been just as ineffective against the demands of the National Union of Railwaymen, whose members seek an increase in wage rates of 12 shillings sixpence ($2.50) a week.

RAILWAYMEN ALSO DISCONTENTED

Their demands have been unsuccessful but last week they gave formal notice that a dispute exists between them and the railway executive. This procedure means that Labor Minister George Isaacs has 21 days in which to try to avert strike action.

The feeling they can probably count on the sympathy of the railwaymen may influence the bus drivers in their final decision. On the other hand, they have had warning from the Transport and General Workers' Union that a strike would be unconstitutional.

The agreement between the Union and London Transport forbids either strikes or lock-outs and insists on arbitration. If the drivers do pull up the big red buses on Saturday afternoons it won't be the first time the leadership of the 1,000,000-member Union has been defied recently. Dock workers and truck drivers several times have gone on strike unofficially in moves that mocked Union discipline.
