Jets, Sirens Fail to Worry Wild Ducks
 VANCOUVER (CP)—International Airport, sprawling over the rich delta land near here, has again taken on something of a "wartime" appearance. This time the enemy is the ordinary wild duck, and airport workers have declared open season. Ducks by the thousands have been coming in for landings and taking off. Their favorite landing area is at the end of the new 8,600-foot jet-age runway which cost more than $1,000,000 to build. The ducks pay no attention to airplanes. In one week, two Trans-Canada Air Lines planes were grounded for compulsory checks after flying through flights of ducks. One jet-engineered North Star was held up for 19 minutes while the ground crew plucked feathery remains from engine and exhaust pipes. OLD ROOSTING SPOT The trouble came when the huge runway was extended 4,000 feet, cutting through the centre of an oat field, long a roosting place for ducks. Maintenance crews have fired very rockets among sitting ducks and nothing has happened. Jets scream low over flocks and they go right on feeding. Crash trucks, sirens screaming, have been driven back and forth across the runway just before the airliners are due to arrive. Officials are investigating a siren reputed to make a weird and thunderous noise that can't help but scare away the ducks. The tone is too high pitched to be heard by human ears.
