BLACKWOOD on Bridge

By EASLEY BLACKWOOD

In Most Cases You Can Signal Partner

"This signalling stuff is all right," said Mr. Muzzy, "when you have high cards to signal with. But what good is it when you can't spare any high cards in the suit you want led?"

Well, there are occasional hands where you are stymied in this respect. But not many. Almost always there is some way to tell your partner which way to go.

When you are Mr. Muzzy's partner, your signals have got to be obvious. To show him your interest in a suit you've got to flash something like the 10 spot. He probably won't notice anything lower than that.

But in today's deal, the defenders got their messages across by signals involving nothing higher than deuces. Mr. Dale and Mrs. Keen practically wrote notes to each other to guide the defense into the proper channels.

Mr. Dale led the six of clubs and Mr. Muzzy won with the dummy's ace. Mrs. Keen played the deuce, showing no enthusiasm at all in the continuation of the suit.

Now Mr. Muzzy led a spade from the board and, after much useless study, played the jack. Mr. Dale won with the queen and had a critical decision to make. He knew his partner was not interested in clubs, but he had no idea which of the red suits she wanted led.

Instead of making a blind stab, he found a way to get some exact information. He cashed the ace of spades. On this trick Mrs. Keen was able to make a discard. As you see, she was panting for a heart lead, but the only unessential card she had in the suit was the deuce. Of course, the play of that card would say she was not able to win heart tricks.

The bidding:

South	West	North	East
1 S	Pass	2 NT	Pass
3 S	Pass	4 S	All pass

Of course the solution to her problem was simple. She just dropped her deuce of diamonds. Having discouraged diamond and club leads, she got the only lead left—a heart—and the contract was down one.

Note that if Mr. Dale had returned a diamond, Mr. Muzzy could have made 10 tricks, discarding one heart on the king of diamonds and another on dummy's fourth club.
