DUESSELDORF, Germany — (Reuters) — Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's Christian Democratic party flushed by its election success, pits the power of its popular mandate this week against the organized strength of German labor.

Tricked by the pre-election Socialist sympathies of the 6,000,000-member Trade Union Federation (DGB), the party is pulling no punches in its move to draw the country's major labor body under closer surveillance.

Right now it talks of persuasion rather than ultimatum. But beneath its demand for DGB "neutrality in party politics" lies a sharp insistence that the union accept more Christian Democratic party representatives into its leadership to offset the present preponderance of Socialists.

If the party doesn't get its way, it threatens to split the present unified labor movement and set up its own conservative — led unions.

The decision to press ahead with its offensive came at a meeting Saturday of the 40 chief executives of the Christian Democratic workers organization, known as the party's "social affairs committee." It appointed Jakob Kaiser, minister of all-German affairs in the outgoing Adenauer cabinet, to head a committee of three to lay down terms to the union leadership this Friday.

They are armed with a demand for "immediate establishment of conditions within the DGB which guarantee its neutrality in party politics." To ensure this neutrality and give more voice to non-Socialist workers, they will ask the union to increase its executive from nine to 11 men, with the new posts to go to Christian Democratic labor leaders.

They also are expected to press hard for the ousting of Matthias Foecher, one of the two present Christian Democratic representatives in the executive, who is regarded as having gone over to the Socialist side during the election campaign. If this manoeuvre succeeds, they probably will replace Foecher with Kaiser himself.

They also seek to build up their strength at lower levels throughout the DGB organization, installing more Christian Democratic leaders on the governing boards of the 16 different industrial unions making up the DGB.

DGB officials have made no reply to the offensive from Adenauer's party yet, pending a meeting of the union executive sometime this week. Ludwig Rosenberg, a member of the governing body, said Sunday night the union had received no notice yet of the Christian Democratic demands, but the executive would discuss them if they were delivered in time.

Navy Tells of Evacuating UN-Held Islands Under Truce

OTTAWA — Throughout the Korean war United Nations warships kept up a ceaseless patrol to protect three islands off the Korean coast from invasion because radar equipment on the islands was keeping watch on enemy planes.

Under the terms of the July 26 armistice the UN was required to evacuate within 10 days Chodo, Sokto islands, off the west coast, and Yang-Do off the east. All are north of the 38th parallel.

Abel Burns Bridges and Slam Collapses

Here is another hand, which went sour because the declarer burned his bridges behind him by banking everything on one specific line of play.

How would you go about winning all 13 tricks after the jack of hearts opening? Mr. Abel's play went as follows. He won the first trick with the ace of hearts. He cashed the ace and king of trumps, noting with satisfaction that this was enough to pick up all four outstanding cards in the suit.

Now (he thought) it was just a matter of ruffing a diamond in dummy or ruffing two diamonds, if necessary. But when he laid down the ace and king of that suit, he found it was going to be necessary to ruff three diamonds. Quite a job — with only two trumps on the board. In fact, Mr. Abel found it impossible and down he went.

I agree that it seemed somewhat more "natural" to try and set up diamonds rather than clubs. First, because it comes easier to most players to set up long suits in the closed hand rather than long suits in the open hand.

Second, because there were seven diamonds in the two hands and only five clubs.

The point is, however, that Mr. Abel could and should have kept both possibilities alive on the simple and unassailable theory that two chances are better than one.

See what would have happened if he had won the second trump trick in dummy with the queen of spades. Now cash the ace and king of clubs, discarding the trey of hearts and a small diamond from the closed hand. Trump a club. Cash the two top diamonds, discarding a heart on the second one, and ruff a diamond on the board. Ruff another club in the closed hand.

When the clubs break 4-4, dummy is good with the exception of the remaining heart and Mr. Abel would have a trump left for that.

Big Canoe Proud of Name

VANCOUVER — It's his name and he's proud of it, but it does make things a little difficult for William Alvin Big Canoe.

Big Canoe is the surname of the 23-year-old Indian from Ontario's Lake Simcoe district, who is ranked as an ordinary seaman in Her Majesty's Royal Canadian Navy.

OS. Big Canoe was a member of the HMCS Naden honor guard at the Pacific National Exhibition just closed here. He is the son of a Chippewa chief, and he joined the navy just after his 21st birthday.

William isn't kicking but he says such wisecracks as "go and paddle somewhere else" or "don't get your feet wet" became a little wearing after more than a year in the navy. "It was a great name to my forefathers and I'm proud of it too," he explained.

Bill is the descendant of a Sioux child who was captured by the Chippewas after a battle. The child always preferred to play with a canoe and when he grew to well over a foot, he received the name Canoe, which has been his down ever since.

The chieftainship of the chemou band might have to Bill if he had stayed with them. It has been in his family for three generations.

"My father moved away became a carpenter in Sudbury the mainland soon after born," he said.

"It took me three years to make up my mind to leave I'm sure I did the right thing."
