Rum-Runners Roam "Main" In New Novel

Fabulous days of the Spanish Main live again in the latest book by the Nova Scotia novelist Thomas H. Raddall.

But it is not the Spanish conquest that Raddall recreates in "Tidefall," McClelland and Stewart. His caravels are grey power cruisers and his conquistadores hard-bitten men who learned the sea on a colder coast than Spain.

The period he deals with is the decade in which prohibition combined with American thirst to create a lawless billion-dollar business along the beaches of the North Atlantic states, the Florida coast and the Gulf of Mexico.

As usual, in Raddall's hands it lives and moves. His story concerns Sax Nolan, scion of a bleak bit of Fundy coast, who sinks a small fortune made in rum and skullduggery into a moribund shipping business—in an effort to satisfy the craving of his smart, courageous, unscrupulous spirit for something he sees as class.

The mixture of Sax and the bleak port on Fundy and the girl Rena Caraday produce a story that is typical Raddall. As always, you can see the stunted spruce flattened by salt wind, feel the edge of wind and jolt of tumbling tide, and hear the authentic colloquial speech of men and women.
