But the new drugs are intentionally made just a bit different from ordinary amino bricks. The cancer cells often will accept them, and then discover that these new bricks are really monkey wrenches in their life

The new research was described to reporters, touring cancer centres under sponsorship of the American Cancer Society, by Drs. Charles F. Geschichter and Murray M. Copeland.

Th€ key is altering the chemical make-up of the amino wolves to make them look like sheep.

The change is slight. Some are not harmful to healthy, living cells. But they are bad for cancer cells.

About 60 humans have been given the new wolf-drug in the last two years. So far, a few cancer patients have responded favorably.

The drug relieved pain and brought some shrinkage of farspread .cancers in patients with cancers of the stomach, intestines, genital and urinary tracts. Some were improved for several
