Edmonton Actress Now British Star

By MURIEL NARRAWAY
 Canadian Press Staff Writer

LONDON 4.—The new year has a problem for dark-haired, Edmonton-born Dianne Foster, 23-year-old wife of Toronto's Andrew Allan, drama supervisor for the CBC.

Says Dianne, who's been married for just six months—and never been happier in my life—faces the prospect of having to stay in London while husband Andrew returns to Canada for radio commitments.

Diane, a dark-eyed, five-foot-two Canadian, came to London in July, 1950, on holiday after two years in radio in Toronto. As with many another Canadian entertainer, the holiday soon turned into a business proposition. Now Dianne has a five-year contract with a British film company and has just finished her second stage appearance.

Her first dramatic role in London started last February in Agatha Christie's thriller, "The Hollow." She played Veronica Gray, a middle-aged blonde actress and one of the principal suspects in a murder case.

For this, Dianne went blonde and "looked such a mess" she crept out daily in a huge fur cap that obscured her hair from view.

WITH ORSON WELLES

Her next part was dark-haired Bianca in Orson Welles' "Othello" at St. James's theatre, which came off just before Christmas. This was the greatest thrill of Dianne's career in London. One of her aims in coming here was to study voice control, and she says it's less in itself just to listen to Welles.

Since then she has appeared in one film, is making another and has had parts in two stage plays, including "Othello" with Orson Welles in the title role. Dianne has also made one film "Quiet Woman," starring Derek Bond and Jane Hylton. Now she is at work on "Lost Hours" with Jean Kent and Montreal's Mark Stevens, playing the part of a loose-living red-head while Jean, who generally takes this type of part, wears the halo.

Dianne is already committed for a third film. This means she will be unable to return to Canada with her husband when his six months' leave from the CBC ends in March. At present Allan is working with the BBC as a temporary producer in the features department.

Army Again Brings Cheer And Happiness to Needy

Many Prince Rupert people may have been under the impression that there were no needy persons in the city this Christmas and that abundance of employment and high wages were making it possible for everyone to enjoy the new high standard of living. The Salvation Army found it different in quite a number of cases.

Salvation Campaign

Reporting this morning, Major W. C. Poulton told the Daily News that the Army had found a number of pensioners and people trying to live on fixed incomes who have been having a difficult time to get by.

For these people what the Army was able to provide meant the difference between a "comfortable" and an "austere" Christmas.

"These are the folks who are really suffering from the new high cost of living and for whom we were able to render a useful service which was much appreciated.

"The people who dropped their donations in our Christmas pot may feel satisfied that their gifts were put to good use in places where it did real good in bringing happiness and good cheer," the major added.

There were twenty-six such incidents where Army hampers and other assistance were of extreme and heart-warming helpfulness. Army pot returns this Christmas were fourteen percent up from last year.
