Little League Baseball
Flourishes in States

By GAYLE TALBOT

NEW YORK (AP)—In the Lambs Club at the far end of the bar there is a large, round table, and over one of the chairs there is a lifelike portrait of the late John J. McGraw, held by many to have been the greatest baseball manager of them all.

This is where the Little League held almost nightly court when his Giants were in town. The old-timers around the Lambs Club like to recall that if there was to be a bit of trouble on a given night, starting with loud words and winding up with a swinging of fists, this was a likely place for it. John, they say, was ever ready, especially if some tenderfoot could be coaxed into addressing him as "Mugsy," a nickname he disliked.

Over the end of the bar there also is a splendid likeness of the late John Barrymore, who was an actor member of the club. That, they tell you, is where John always stood. The room is steeped in sentiment, and it seemed a fine place to get the latest word on little league baseball—for boys up to 13—from Col. W. H. (Cappy) Wells, who is its director of public relations.

Cappy, himself, is more or less overwhelmed by the little league.

"Last time I counted," he said, "we had 776 leagues and 3,333 teams in 38 states and a lot of foreign countries. No telling how many there are at this moment. They keep coming at us."

Here's a question this department would like answered. Has anyone ever caught sockeye salmon entering fresh water on a lure? If so, what kind of lures? We recently read an article which relates to sockeye fishing with flies in Brooks River, entering Bristol Bay, Alaska.

How it started. The Little League originated only 13 years ago this coming April 21 at Williamsport, Pa., when a public spirited citizen named Carl Stotz decided kids up to 13 should be given a chance to play organized ball, complete with uniforms. Stotz, who still is commissioner of the league, must feel like a man who started raising rabbits in his living room.

"You wouldn't think there were so many kids in the world," Wells said. "What we've got now is farm clubs. They decide to organize a Little League in a town, say six teams. Know how many kids turn out—400, that's how many."

"So the managers hold tryouts and pick their clubs, and all the others go into the farm system. All they get are caps and shoes. They have a regular league of their own, a sort of minor Little League, and they play a schedule, too. The managers in the main league watch these little fellows and as they lose their own players they bid for them. There's always a stock of kids coming up."

In the event that some reader has not previously heard of the Little League, it perhaps should be explained that the youngsters play on a diamond two-thirds regulation size and with a ball somewhat less lively than the store brand lest a third-baseman get scalped. The batter must wear a protective helmet. At the last broad estimate, 250,000 boys belonged to the league.

Robinson Kayoes Graziano

after Graziano himself had floored the champion midway in the third.

A few seconds after Graziano had belted Robinson to the floor along the ropes with ponderous right hand smash to the head, Robinson unleashed a lightning quick left and right combination which felled Graziano. Rocky was counted out, but, by a game instinct, he struggled to his feet and, with a helpless waving of fists, tried to continue the battle.

Promoters listed the gate as gross $252,237.66 and net $194,028.97.

Kiner Hitting To Right Field

NEW ORLEANS—Ralph Kiner, Pittsburgh Pirate home run hitter, says he is going to do more than hit round trippers this season.

"I've tried hitting the ball to right field occasionally," said Kiner, whose homers usually are dead to left field. "And I have been working on hit and run plays and bunting occasionally."

Manager Bill Meyer declared Kiner "seems to be an altogether different player. When you get a fellow like that—who tries to improve himself all the time—you have something."
