He had the gifts to probe more deeply through west coast ports, the part of the Communists to into this realm than any of his contemporaries and, in fact, may have been advanced in his thinking by several generations.

But tragically he gained little satisfaction from his extraordinary journeys into the unknown. His attitude of personal detachment that made them possible was not shared by the generation in which he lived. His findings in the field of pure science to which he devoted his life were given a material application that surprised and alarmed him. In addition, he found that while few could understand his work, there was no reluctance about hailing him as a genius. The result was he became a sightseers' curiosity comparable to the Grand Canyon and Marlon Brando. The estimate of the man was not in what he did but in what he wore and what he had for breakfast.

This emphasis on the earthy aspects of his accomplishments and his person was not understood by level followed up and amounts and amounts are the visionary Einstein. While Einstein may have felt disillusioned, his experience will not discourage others from trying to press beyond the boundaries he reached. All through history men have known the urge to push farther into the unknown and have surrendered to it.

Whatever the price of this curiosity, it would be far worse if it were denied expression. To pretend we are any less than we really are would be to forego the chance to find the real greatness of man as well as his weakness.
