

Labor Party Decides Not To Expel Bevan

LONDON (Reuters) — Britain's Labor party leaders today decided not to expel rebel Aneurin Bevan for past defiance of their orders, but warned of "drastic action" against future violations.

After deciding to keep the fiery left-winger within the party ranks, the 28-member national executive called for leftist and right factions to unite now "in a determined endeavor to secure the return of a Labor government at the general election" — rumored today to be coming May 28.

The executive's resolution said the parliamentary Labor organization was "fully justified" in barring Bevan from its ranks two weeks ago for his refusal to follow official policy in a parliamentary debate.

PROMISES TO BEHAVE

It then referred to Bevan's promise to a special eight-member committee of the executive Tuesday to behave in the future.

The executive quoted the pledge given by Bevan. This said that he had never meant to embarrass the party leadership.

"But if my action or speech could lend themselves to the interpretation that such was my motive, then I am sincerely sorry

I apologize for any pain I may have caused . . ." Bevan added.

Bevan said any differences of policy in the party should be resolved "without personal recrimination in a way that would leave the essential unity of the party unimpaired."

DEFIED ATTLEE

Bevan's latest tiff in a four-year running quarrel with the leadership resulted from his public defiance of party chief Clement Attlee in a House of Commons debate on the hydrogen bomb early this month.

It was understood that the vote today to expel Bevan or keep him inside the party was 16 to 7, with five members not voting.

Today's decision still leaves Bevan outside the Labor group in Parliament, barred from taking any part officially in the activities of the group.

But the executive's decision means that after a short period he can apply to be readmitted to the parliamentary organization.

Diagnose Plan of Action Then Try to Thwart It

Here is a suggestion that will improve your defensive play. Diagnose declarer's plan.

Instead of being content to defend card by card and trick led another club.

Dummy's Jack was trapped and Mr. Dale cashed the ten and Queen. After that, Mr. Abel was held to three trump tricks and the two red aces for down three.

Check on the number of tricks he could have won if Mrs. Fusty had been stolidly determined to win her tricks fast by playing the ace and another spade beginning at trick two.
