

Londoners Help Each Other Get to Work

Despite the rail strike, most Londoners got to work yesterday, rumpled, breathless in some cases footsore, and with lift stickers on windows of private automobiles in numbers.

Most of the free-lift vehicles that of Cyril Aylott, in a suburb. It is a built for two. A sign on the dashboard said anyone will help pedal was welcome second seat. He had come the way to town.

strike seemed to cancel out another. Hull waterfront strikers planned to go to London by special train to help London dockers picket the Thames. But there were no trains, so the London dockers got no help from Hull.

speed about delivering mail, and the young drivers are having a lot of fun. The post office provided official signs to identify their trucks, official placards saying "Royal Mail." The high-spirited soldiers add signs of their own. One today said "Post early for Christmas." Another, "Bound for Newcastle, whoopee."

The rail strike means less school for many children. Sir David Eccles, minister of education, authorized local authorities to shorten school hours in places where children are endangered by the afternoon traffic rush.

THIRD TIME PROVES FATAL

NEW YORK (AP) — A 66-year-old jeweler, who had killed one would-be robber and aided in the capture of another years ago, met death Wednesday in his east Harlem shop at the hands of another gunman who escaped. Joseph J. Blitar often said he would "never let a stickup man get away without a fight." He shot one bandit to death in 1948. In 1951 he fired a salvo at another man who tried to rob him. He didn't get a chance to use his gun Wednesday.
