been adequately met, he said. The principal said that there were several standards set by the department which accredited a school, such as the trained quality of the principal and teachers, school provisions for necessary courses and extracurricular activities, the necessary equipment and material, the atmosphere of the school and the standard of achievement of the students. .

"It was this last requirement, 'the standard of achievement of students on departmental examinations' which discredited the school. Mr. Lucas said.

The following problems were given by the principal for some of the reasons for the high failure rate:

• Lack of continuity of staff: Of 34 teachers, only nine have been in Prince Rupert longer than two years.

• Discipline. The pupil who refuses to conform to school? rules not only distracts other students but wastes the teacher's |
