THE NAVAL PROGRAMME.

> It was to be expected that the expressions in the Mother Country respecting the naval policy of the Dominion Premier should be in enthusiastic approval. No matter what proposal might have been made there would have been almost unanimous expressions of assent and gratification. Had Mr. Borden offered one dreadnought and announced his intention of beginning the immediate construction of a Canadian navy the British verdict it would have been so, we canit would hve been so, we cannot help saying, with more reason.

But in all the expressions given utterance to in the Mother Country it is noticeable that there is not the faintest reference to any immediate necessity for such an addition to the navy. There is not so much as a hint that any emergency exists; and yet it was on the plea that there was an emergency that Mr. Borden formulated his programme. Because of the urgent nature of the international situation the Federal government has left over the permanent policy which, we are given to understand, is to be pursued until another session.

Every Canadian should note, too, that Mr. Borden had absolutely nothing to say with respect to the defence of the coasts of Canada. It does not require a naval expert to tell'

This is no idle supposition. On this coast there is absolutely no defence against naval attack. Our harbors are unprotected and foreign vessels could at any time sail in and shell our cities or take possession of them as they wished. In a war with a great sea power Great BURGLAR IS WOUNDED Britain cannot afford to protect the colonies, and it was with a thorough knowledge of that fact that Sir Wilfrid Boy Laurier and his government decided on the establishment of a Canadian navy.
