ANOTHER INSPECTOR

A mining boom may be expected to break out in the north at any moment. The government has assured William Manson, or William Manson has assured the government, it does not matter much which, that a mining inspector is to be appointed in the north. What has the north done to deserve such a benefaction? Think of it! We are to have a mining inspector all to ourselves. Once the inspector has been appointed, the government can again recline in its easy chair, satisfied that it has at least done its duty by the north, no matter what critics may say.

It is to be hoped that the prospector and the mining, speculator thoroughly appreciate what is to be done for score of inspectors of one kind or another, but it required the foresight of a Bowser or a Manson to discover that all that the north needed to produce unheard of mining development was a mining inspector all to itself. When that mining inspector really gets into his stride, the Portland Canal, the Rocher de Boule and all the other mining sections will blossom like the proverbial rose. It is too bad that this was not discovered sooner. Here has the north been figuring that times were bad, in fact many of the pioneers have left the district in the belief that they had either to get out: get a government job or starve, while the remedy was ready to hand. All that was needed was a mining inspector. If prosperity follows inspectors, why not appoint half a dozen? If one inspector can do much, have taking ways. surely an army of them can do much more.

If a mining inspector can produce a mining boom, a building inspector should, according to Tory reasoning, produce a building boom and so on. An inspector of oyster beds might foster untold possibilities on this coast, while a few score additional timber inspectors might cause fir to sprout where inspector and, presto! it done.
