THE DEBATE

When Sir Robert Borden was cordingly. negotiating with Sir Wilfrid Laurier for a Coalition Government, he proposed that the compulsory Military Service Law, after its adoption by Parliament, be withheld from enforcement pending its approval by the people in an election. Sir Wilfrid's amendment to the present bill calls for a referendum to the people on the question. The chief defect, it is pointed out by the Victoria Times, is that both proposals would take up too much time.

It continues: "The soldiers overseas who are most directly concerned in the issue would have to be given an opportunity to record their views, and this would be a difficult and laborour proceeding. It would be some months before a decision could be reached, and in the meantime the Canadian army in France would be fighting with rapidly thinning numbers. This system of determining a policy is proper in time of peace as long as it is not abused: but in time of war it is beside the question. It costs the lives of many brave men; it exposes others to frightful suffering.

The theory that a nation can conduct a great war on the basis of peace conditions is ridiculous. A nation at war assumes a condition absolutely antagonistic to that of peace. .It cannot exert all its power unless it does, and if it does not exert all its power, it is false to itself. Its Government must lead and act-not talk. compromise and dodge big issues. It must march at the head of the people, not behind them. Imagine France holding an election or a referendum in August, 1914, to determine wheter she should call up all her conscript classes!

The defence of Canada is being maintained in Flanders and France, and any other conception is a ghastly illusion. What would happen if that line were broken? Germany woud be mistress of Europe, and with France as her base she could isolate Great Britain and force a peace of her own choice or challenge the immediate security of this continent The United States casual knowledge of German policy can think otherwise passes our comprehension. Even if there were an inconclusive peace, Canada, like the United States, would have to work and sleep with her arms beside her. Great Britain is suffering today because she did not stand alongside France in 1870 with all the resources at her command.

While in our view Sir Wilfrid's proposal for a referendum does not meet the situa- RAILROAD EQUIPMENT tion, his complaint that he was not consulted before the compulsory service measure was prepared is entirely well founded. Sir Robert Borden's conduct in this respect is highly censurable. It is apparent that he never intended to consult his political opponents at all when he made the proposal in the war a private political afrecord of blunder, ineptitude and worse which began at the very outset when with an eye solely to political effect he decided to hold at arm's length all but that sorry collection of incapables-Crothers, Reid and the rest-in the direction of this country in the greatest crisis in its history.

It was only when the anticonscription demonstrations where that, characteristically enough, he wavered and then sought Laurier's co-operation to help him out of his predicabill had been fully drawn up.
