POLITICAL TACTICS

The peculiar situation arising over the Military Service Bill in the Dominion House is causing great attention all over the country. On this occasion members of the opposition voted with the Government and several members who hitherto have voted with the Government, on this occasion voted with the opposition, and the passage of the bill is hailed as a victory for the Government. The real success or non success of the Government in this matter will be shown in the enforcing of the provisions of the Act.

The position taken up by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as leader of the opposition, and his request for a referendum has been consistent with his attitude all along, which is more than can be said of the Government headed by Sir Robert Borden. Not once but many times since the war began Sir Robert declared that Conscription would never come in Canada. The position of Sir Wilfrid is well stated by the Toronto Globe as follows:

The political perplexities today have their origin mainly in the general election of 1911. Two distinct campaigns were waged by the enemies of the Laurier Government. The English-speaking provinces heard only the loyalty cry, which took the place of economic argument against the trade agreement with the United States. But reciprocity was not made an issue by the Government's opponents in French-speaking Canada. Mr. Bourassa found in the Naval Service Act a weapon more to his liking, and an opportunity to indulge his inveterate hatred of Sir Wilfrid Laurier as the chief impediment to his own ambitions, and to the Nationalist movement. To profit by the situation in Quebec, Conservative leaders betrayed the Canadian navy policy. Expert in the constituencies where the English voters were in the majority or held the balance of power, the Conservative party in that province merged itself entirely in the Nationalist propaganda. It followed Mr. Bourassa's leadership, and abetted his attempts to inflame race feeling and sow hatred of British connection.

Few English-speaking Canadians have an adequate conception of the malice and fury of the attacks upon the Liberal leader in his own province. The Bourassas, the Blondins and the Sevignys played artfully upon the fears and credulity of a simple pastoral people. The habitant was told that his sons would be dragged from the plough by Laurier's minions and forced to serve on British warships, perhaps to be disembowled by German cannon. The cry of conscription hurled at the Naval Service Act was repelled by Sir Wilfrid Laurier with absolute sincerity. It is, therefore, not a new issue in Quebec, as in the English provinces. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has had to face it once before. In estimating his present attitude, it is but simple justice to recall the assurances he gave his compatriots when he was commending to them a great measure of co-operation with the mother country in naval defence. He feels, no doubt, that his honor was pledged in that campaign, and that he must escape the reproach of inconsistency if he is to maintain the personal authority which he hopes to exercise for national unity in the future as in the past. In addressing recruiting meetings during the present war he had also pointed to assurances of members of the Government that there would be no conscription, and he had joined in pronouncing against it, a view which he shared at the time, with nearly every public man in the country. Canadians opposed to his views ought to make allowance for the position in which he is placed by antecedent events. They ought also to remember with gratitude that he took his political life in his hands six years ago in order to perform a splendid Imperial service. If there are stormy times ahead, he will be a unique moderating and reconciling influence, and will be animated, as always, by the loftiest sentiments of patriotism.

with a ver bad grace. That the Capital of the Empire should be the object of repeated attacks by the air squadrons of Germany does not seem fitting. The British pride has been hurt. Dwelling alone and in a place where hitherto no enemy could touch them, the fact that aerial warfare knows no frontiers has been forcibly brought home. Reprisals are being advocated in a louder tone than ever. If such is the only method whereby the bombardment of open towns can be obviated, then reprisals ought to be made and soon, too.

Another statement of Germany's peace terms is expected from the German Chancellor today. War aims and peace terms, the two expressions have gone together for a long while now. It is apparent that the tide of victory has begun to ebb for the Central Powers. This is apparent now across the Rhine. The German war aims are as far from being fulfilled as their peace terms will be. Neither Germany nor the Entente will be content that the status quo ante be readopted, but for very different reasons. Germany will have to take the peace terms she is offered. Germany declared war, but peace will be declared by the Allies.
