Prince Rupert and Alaska

IT IS NO EASY THING to change a long-established trading route. Certainly such a thing cannot be done overnight. Nevertheless, Prince Rupert, to which the United States turned in the emergency of war and was quickly made the "Port for Alaska," anticipates that, in due course, its naturally strategic position will make it the permanent peacetime port for the territory which now aspires to statehood.

Prince Rupert which between Pearl Harbor and V-J Day shipped a million-and-a-half tons of freight and 35,000 troops and civilian workers in 3,000 ships to Alaska war zones, watches with keen interest the efforts of Alaskans to free themselves from the shackles of Seattle interests which have held them in economic subjection these many years through confinement of the avenues of trade and commerce. Prince Rupert realizes that this is a problem that Alaskans must work out for themselves and only wishes that international propriety would permit of local and national authorities making more active gestures of co-operation.

Certainly, the port of Prince Rupert, almost in sight as it is of the Alaskan Panhandle and 500 miles closer to the territory than Seattle, the nearest Pacific Coast railway terminal, equipped as it is with every modern port facility, much of which was installed by the Americans themselves during the war, can lay fair claim to be the "Port for Alaska." If Prince Rupert were an American city instead of a Canadian there would, of course, be no question about it.

In spite of the international aspect, however, in spite of restrictive legislation and regulations which both Alaska and Prince Rupert people know are intended for no other purpose than to help Seattle maintain its control over Alaska's trade, there is every reason to expect that Nature itself will, in time, be the turning factor in the situation and that, just as surely as water will eventually overflow and run downhill, so will the logical trade route from the greater portion of the United States be over the great Canadian transcontinental to the splendidly equipped all-year port of Prince Rupert and on to Alaska.

The diversion is already commencing in a small ready and waiting to buy anyway. It may be expected to quickly gain momen-

FISHERIES SUPPORT BOARD

VITAL IMPORTANCE to Prince Rupert, I since it directly concerns what is still this port's basic industry, is the question of maintaining fish prices which are showing weakness these days. It is, therefore, satisfactory to see the government organizing a fisheries support board as authorized by Parliament.

It is particularly satisfactory that men who are so intimately associated with the fisheries of Prince Rupert should have been named members of the board. We refer to Col. J. W. Nicholls, formerly general manager of Canadian Fish & Cold Storage Co., now retired, and K. F. Harding, the able and energetic young general manager of the Prince Rupert Fishermen's Co-operative which now occupies such an important position in the fishing industry scene in all its phases.

Richard Nelson, president of Nelson Bros. Fisheries Ltd., which has large operating interests in this area, is also named to the Pacific Coast advisory board.

PROVIDE THINGS NECESSARY

man who earned his own comfortable retirement by rendering good service and good value, enabling many to enjoy the good things of life, says that much of our economic difficulty is caused by people overlooking the biblical injunction, "provide things necessary."

The tendency of people to purchase luxuries before they have provided for their needs in homes, food, clothing, education and personal progress, is not only personal folly but it destroys the solid basis of society on which alone the standard of living can be raised.

The industry and thrift which provides homes before luxuries, are the basis of good living and better earning which will make the home-owners better prospects for more and better goods than those who buy luxuries before houses.

The list of luxuries which should succeed rather than precede things necessary, could be extended indefinitely. Many manufacturers of these luxuries, and the retailers of them, know that their sales over a period of years will be much greater if the buyers of luxuries have first provided themselves with things necessary to good living, greater earnings, and personal advancement.

LEGION CALLS TENDERS SOON

Building to Be Double Present Size-Plans Nearing Completion

Local Canadian Legion expects to call for tenders about October 1 for the new addition to their building on Third Avenue which will just double the size of the present structure. There will be a new front and the main hall, by being extended across the full fifty feet width of the enlarged building, will be just twice the present size.

William Brass, who has been here in connection with the drafting of plans for the new building, will sail tomorrow after noon by the Cocuitlam on his return to Vancouver.

S. A. Dumas and son, Ivan, sailed Saturday on the Camosun to spend a two weeks' holiday in Vancouver.
