In everything except training Mr. Pearson is the antithesis of the kind of Canadian who usually represents us in our foreign affairs. Whereas the men of his department are inclined to be on the formal and somewhat sombre side, the chief himself is easy to meet and is obviously more comfortable behind a bright bow-tie than a dark four-inhand.

When at one reception in Ottawa an embarrassed hostess found herself running short of ice, it was guest-of-honor Mr. Pearson who scurried up the street with a bucket to obtain a fresh supply from a neighboring friend.

His individuality is the more remarkable in light of his early training which was of a very conventional sort. He grew up in the department and went through the usual secretaryships in which a young man is obliged to have scrupulous respect for his P's and Q's, to say nothing of the vast wisdom of his superiors.

Possibly this rigid grooming caused him to assume his present unorthodox manner, although even in the early years his hair never sat quite so smoothly on his head as that of his contemporaries.

Whatever the reasons, the overall effect is good. Canada is a young country and those representing her to outsiders should not take their responsibilities so seriously that they do her the injustice of behaving like old men.
