MISS KELSEY IS MARRIED

St. Andrew's Anglican Cathedral was the scene at 2 o'clock this afternoon of a very happy event when Miss Gertrude Edith Kelsey, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Kelsey of this city, was united in marriage to Ralph James Berney, son of Mr. and Mrs. James Berney of Ladner, B.C.

The bride, who was gowned in a charming costume of ivory chiffon velvet and carried a shower bouquet of Ophelia roses and lilies-of-the-valley, entered the church upon the arm of her father, by whom she was given in marriage. She was accompanied by her matron-of-honor, Mrs. R. G. Macauley, sister of the groom, whose habit was a striking gown of peach crepe back satin with silver hat and slippers, carrying a bouquet of bronze chrysanthemums.

Rev. Canon W. F. Rushbrook, B.A., L.Th., officiated. The prayer book used in the ceremony was a present which was given to the bride by the Sunday School children of St. Peter's Church, Mrs. E. J. Smith presided at the organ during the ceremony and played the Wedding March. Reg and Tom Kelsey, brothers of the bride, were ushers.

After the ceremony, a reception was held at the home of the bride's parents, 1829 Fifth Avenue East, after which the happy couple embarked aboard the steamer Princess Norah for a honeymoon tour in the south, on conclusion of which they will take up residence at Sardis in the Fraser Valley, where the groom is to engage in farming. The bride's going-away outfit consisted of a sun tan broad-cloth coat with heavy collar and cuffs and a crepe back dress of lighter tone sun tan satin with hat and shoes to match. The couple were farewelled by a large gathering of friends.

Many beautiful and costly wedding gifts testified to the esteem in which Mr. and Mrs. Berney are held. The bride for several years was stenographer to City Solicitor E. F. Jones and took an active part in church work as the superintendent of St. Peter's Sunday School. The groom has lived here for several years, having formerly been identified with the boiler house staff at the plant of the Canadian Fish & Cold Storage Co., and more lately with the power house at the drydock. They will have the congratulations and best wishes of many friends.

ONLY FORTY MILES OF ROAD

The Vancouver Province has come out as the champion of the town of Powell River which badly needs roads, for it has only about forty miles just now over which residents can drive after they have cruised around the streets of the town.

We suggest to the Province that it might also take up the cause of Prince Rupert, a larger town than Powell River, which has only five and a half miles of road outside the city limits over which residents can drive.

This is the Christmas season and the good will of the leading paper of Canada's greatest western city might well be extended to this northern section of the province from which the city of Vancouver derives much profit. We are glad to see Powell River claims championed, if only so that Prince Rupert's claims to a highway might be brought into relief. The whole argument in favor of relief for Powell River applies much more forcibly to Prince Rupert, so we quote herewith the article:

POWELL RIVER'S CLAIM

Seventy miles north of Vancouver, on the Gulf of Georgia, is the thriving paper town of Powell River, one of the industrial bright spots on the map of British Columbia. Powell River has about five thousand people, all of them well to do, and it has, consequently, a very high purchasing power. But it has one grievance. Except for its water connection with Vancouver, it is cut off from the remainder of British Columbia. There are several hundred automobiles in the town, and they can cruise about the town streets, run fifteen miles or so northward to Lund, run eighteen miles or so southward to Lang Bay and Stillwater, run a few miles inland to Cranberry Lake. But when they have covered all these roads—and it doesn't take very long—they have exhausted the cruising possibilities of the district.

Across the gulf from Powell River, on Vancouver Island, and only twenty miles away is the prosperous rural community of the Comox Valley and the town of Courtenay, which is that community's centre. Courtenay is connected with the fine road system of Vancouver Island, and through ferries at Nanaimo, Victoria and Sidney with the far-reaching road systems of the United States and Canada. But Courtenay has a grievance, too. The most promising market that offers for its agricultural produce—for its milk and butter and cheese, its vegetables and meats, its poultry and eggs—is in the thriving industrial town just across the gulf. At present the gulf divides and does not connect. There is no adequate boat service between the two places.

What is needed, of course, to remedy the situation, is a regular ferry, running twice a day or oftener between Courtenay and Powell River. The ferry would prove a boon to both Powell River which could get its supplies regularly and cheaply and always in a fresh condition, and the Comox farmers who would have a ready market always open. Besides, if the ferry were equipped to carry automobiles, it would very soon develop an important tourist traffic, and, in the summer months, would very likely have to make at least four trips a day.

The mainland terminus of the ferry could be at the Powell River wharf. Courtenay, however, is on Comox Bay, and the entrance to this body of water is often difficult owing to currents and shallows. It might be better to make the Island terminus at Little River, only seventeen miles from Powell River and eight miles from Courtenay by a good road already built.

The ferry, of course, would come under the provincial government and would require a subsidy. But that is not an argument against it. The provincial government is interested in developing the country and in finding a market for agricultural produce. There is a market waiting here for the produce of an important area. It only requires to be seized.

POLITICAL GOSSIP AT P. RUPERT

Despatch Published in South Purports To Give Situation in This City

A despatch from Prince Rupert, doubtless sent by some correspondent other than the recognized press correspondents of the city, appears in the columns of the Vancouver Province dealing with the local federal political situation. While doubtless based largely on street gossip here, it may have in it a modicum of truth, although no one here seems to have any information on the subject. The despatch follows:

PRINCE RUPERT, Dec. 14.—Presence of T. D. Pattullo, House leader of the Liberal party at Victoria, in Ottawa this week, has given rise to the rumor that the British Columbia Liberal has expressed willingness to trade his job on the coast for a seat in the re-organized King cabinet at Ottawa. Changes are being made by Premier King following the promotion of Hon. C. A. Dunning to the office of minister of finance. New names of Liberals in Eastern Canada are being advanced for cabinet honors. W. E. N. Sinclair, the leader of a lost cause in Ontario, has conferred with the Premier. Mr. Pattullo was early on the scene, reaching Ottawa shortly after the return of Premier King from the coast.

Depends On Skeena

Mr. Pattullo's friends declare that, as things are now, he is the only man who can definitely assure Premier King that he can be elected as a straight Liberal in British Columbia. They state that if elevated to the cabinet, Skeena riding, which includes Prince Rupert, would accord Mr. Pattullo the support always generously given in provincial elections.

There is only one stumbling block in the way of the proposals being advanced in behalf of the British Columbia House leader. At present Mr. Olaf Hanson, well-known timber operator, is the nominated Liberal candidate in Skeena. He is a popular and successful man and believes that he can easily defeat the sitting Conservative member, J. C. Brady. Mr. Hanson must be asked to withdraw to make way for Mr. Pattullo and it is said would give the matter serious consideration. A reward for doing so would be appointment to the position of director of Canadian National Railway to succeed the late Fred Dawson of Prince Rupert.

Hanson Not Eager

Mr. Hanson doesn't desire the position of Canadian National Railway director. For one reason it would debar him from continuing to sell the railway a vast amount of ties, telegraph poles and bridge timbers. He would like to sit in the House of Commons but believes that he would only neglect his own extensive timber business to mix up in railway affairs.

Mr. Hanson, like many a successful politician in the North-western United States, is of Scandinavian stock. Throughout the logging camps, mining camps and fishing settlements of Skeena there are hundreds of families of Nordic blood. To them Olaf Hanson is a personal friend and neighbor.

Though one of the most popular men in the cabinet, Hon. Dr. King has been unfortunate in not having behind him the political strength which commands attention at Ottawa. His continued failure to bring a strong delegation of members from British Columbia has forced upon Premier King the need of some sort of change which may make for success at the forthcoming Dominion election in British Columbia. If Mr. Pattullo should be taken into the cabinet it would be partly because of his experience in administrative work at Victoria, but chiefly for the reason that he has a record for successful political organization.

If Mr. Pattullo should quit Victoria, one reason might be that he does not at present enjoy the full authority of leadership. He has been repeatedly reminded by certain groups in the Liberal party that being "House leader" is not to hold party lines. It rather means that the driver's seat is only a temporary place likely to be given Mr. Pattullo only so long as the road is rough. When the way becomes more smooth and success provincially is in sight, there might be such a thing as forcing the "House leader" to make way for a younger man.

Long Time to Wait

Party observers in both camps agree that provincially the Liberals will make little progress against the Talmie government at the next election. Success might be their lot four years after the next election. That would mean nearly eight years of waiting, a long time for a leader as energetic and ambitious as T. D. Pattullo, who is already crowding 60 years of age.

Mr. Pattullo is now on his way to Victoria and is accompanied by his sisters, Mrs. Ballantyne of Toronto and Mrs. E. Bowle of Brookville. He is giving extensive interviews to the newspapers along the way, sounding a strong national note, dwelling on the prosperity which has come to British Columbia through the railway and foreign trade policies of the Federal Government.

Billiard League fixtures originally scheduled for last evening and Thursday have been called off. The first half of the season has now concluded with each of the three teams having played twelve matches, Grotto being well in the lead in the standing.

Sport Chat

Basketball difficulties having been ironed out with the securing of the Stewart Theatre as a venue for games, a winter sports club has now been organized for Stewart. While the organization is primarily to take charge of the playing of basketball, other sports such as skating, tobogganing, and skiing will be engaged in. Officers of the club have been elected as follows: President, W. S. Orr; vice-president, Miss Evelyn Blanton; secretary-treasurer, Miss Dorothy Davies; executive, H. Stewart, George Hills, Max Armour and William Turgoose; manager, E. R. Richardson. Basketball practices commenced at Stewart this week.

School children may be admitted for 25c each to all major league baseball games in 1930 excepting those played on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays. This is the suggestion of Kenesaw M. Landis, commissioner of baseball. "The youngsters are losing interest in baseball because they can't pay a high price for tickets," Landis said. "If the rate is cut to 25c for them, they will become interested in the game again."

INSTALLMENT XXXVII.
 "Well, thank goodness you won't see anything of Mr. Noel Frankland this time," Miss Brown declared. "He wouldn't dare to be seen dancing just now."
 "Mr. Noel Frankland is a forgotten dream," Frances acknowledged. "All the same, it is rather thrilling to think that I might have been a Charlotte Corday, have marched through the streets by his side, waving a banner, uncrowned queen of the revolution!"
 "There's Mr. Paul," Miss Brown ventured.
 Frances was silent. She took up her sponge and towel.
 "Yes," she admitted, "there's Mr. Paul. Another instance of my bad luck. Anybody could fall in love with Mr. Paul, and there he is, the dear boy, without a penny in the world and a family to support. Come and fetch me out, Edith, if I stew too long."
 Miss Brown, after a little hesitation, produced from her wardrobe and slipped on one of her two new evening gowns, black, very simple, but very attractive. She arranged her hair with her usual deliberation, made a careful selection from among her new stock of shoes and stockings and finally looked at herself in the glass. The color flushed delicately in her cheeks. Perhaps Frances was right. Perhaps, after all, she was not so utterly unattractive. And yet, what was the good of it? She was looking perhaps better than she had ever looked in her life—for what purpose? Mr. Paul would have no eyes for anybody but Frances; the casual admiration of strangers meant nothing to her. The person who had incited her to this extravagance was never likely to see its results. She turned away from the glass with a little sigh to find Frances watching her with a smile, half surprised, half quizzical.
 "Not keeping any secrets from me, are you, Edith?"
 "Of course I am not. Why?"
 "I was just wondering for whose sake this transformation was," she observed. "I must say you do things thoroughly when you're about it. Just a touch of my lipstick and you'd look like a demure but not unapproachable little mannequin."
 "I should hate to use lipstick almost as much as I should hate to look like a mannequin," Miss Brown replied sweetly. "I had to have a new frock. I am sure even you will admit that. I hope you think it's all right."
 "I think it's one of the prettiest I ever saw," Frances assured her, sitting down and beginning to brush her hair. "All the same I can't help thinking there's something behind it all. I hope it isn't Mr. Paul."
 Miss Brown took up the evening paper.
 "Please hurry," she begged. "I had lunch at 1 o'clock, and I was too busy for tea."
 They found the little restaurant only moderately well filled. Paul, who had been standing in an attitude of listless dejection exchanging a few remarks with a habitué of the place, glanced up at their entrance and was across the room in half a dozen strides. His expression was transformed. For the first moment he scarcely seemed to see Miss Brown in her new frock. His eyes shone as he looked at Frances. Then he raised her fingers to his lips.
 "It is wonderful to see you—both," he added rapidly, turning to exchange greetings with Miss Brown. "It is a great pleasure, and so unexpected."
 He led them to a table.
 "It is an excellent night that you choose to come," he continued. "I bought some very good pheasants this morning, quite cheap, and there is some soup which is tolerable. Excuse me while I hand in your order."
 Miss Brown looked after his departing figure and sighed.
 "The first man who has seen me in my new frock didn't even notice it."
 "And I don't think you cared much whether he did or not."
 Miss Brown crumbled a roll between her fingers.
 "I am only human," she murmured, "and I like Mr. Paul."
 "I am very human, indeed," Frances observed, her eyes fixed in pleasant anticipation upon the waiter who was approaching with two apertiffs upon a tray, "and I like him, I am quite sure, better than you do."
 Paul returned presently with their half bottle of claret.
 "I do not go any longer to the Cosmopolitan," he announced, a little abruptly. "When I added it up I found that it did not pay. I had to leave here too early and there were so many who did not understand the situation—who asked me to dance with them and gave nothing."
 "Like me," Miss Brown murmured.
 "And me," Frances echoed. He smiled down at them.
 "Now and then of course I dance with my friends," he said.

"It is always understood that I am permitted to do that, but at times I have been fetched by a head waiter to dance with a very unattractive stranger, and have danced with her five or six times, tried to improve her steps, and then she has thought that all is well if she offers me a glass of wine. Can such a woman, I wonder, think that one dances with her for pleasure? However, I do better now. I have an engagement at a small night club which has just opened."
 "We will go there," Miss Brown suggested. "Perhaps you can find some one to dance with me."
 "I have not quite made up my mind about the place yet," he confessed. "I have only been there twice myself. It seems all right."
 "The police have never troubled you about that Clarges Street affair?" Frances inquired.
 He shook his head.
 "I did not expect that they would. It would have been a very bad thing for Bretskopf if his name had got into the paper in connection with such a case. I think some of his friends have been looking for me, but they will find it had to do me a mischief. I keep myself in training."
 Their dinner was brought and Paul returned to his duties. His sister came and said a few polite words; his father rose in his place and addressed a courtly bow to them; Madame beamed a little sedately from her desk. Afterward they were left alone for a time.
 "I am quite convinced," Miss Brown said, "that this young man is in love with you."
 "I wonder whether he is," Frances reflected.
 "I watched his face when he saw us come in. It was boyish but very attractive. He never even noticed my new frock," Miss Brown added pathetically.
 "If you want admirers," Frances began.
 "I don't. At least not casual ones."
 "They have to be casual at first. I rather liked that young man Greatson. I think he'd approve of your new frock."
 "I don't suppose Mr. Greatson has a thought to spare from his work just now," Miss Brown observed. "He's Abel Deane's private secretary, you know."
 "I like young men who work," Frances admitted.
 "So do I," Miss Brown assented. "That's one reason I like Mr. Paul. Should you marry him, Frances, if he wanted you to?"
 "Why do you ask such foolish questions?" was the somewhat irritated reply. "He has his family to support, and I'm afraid he must find it a desperate struggle. His clothes are so well brushed and well pressed, but they're pitifully shabby. He confided to me last time I saw him that he asked at the Cosmopolitan to be allowed to wear a short coat and a black tie, as he couldn't afford a clean white one every night."
 Paul came over to wish them goodby when they paid their bill.
 "If you would really care to come later and see what you think of my new show, I would be very glad to take you," he suggested a little doubtfully. "It is not that sort of place to which you could think of going alone. If you did not like it, or if I did not think it well for you to be there, you can come away at once."
 "I'm sure we shan't want to," Frances declared. "Any sort of place where we can hear some music and get an odd dance will be delightful."
 "We are going to a movie first," Miss Brown told him. "Shall we call round here and fetch you afterward?"
 "It would be most agreeable," Paul assented. "Not before 11 o'clock though, if you please. We can take an omnibus, or if it is fine we might walk. It is only in the next street."
 The movie was only moderately amusing. Paul was waiting for them when they returned to the restaurant, and walked between them toward the club—a protecting figure, his hand frequently respectfully touching Frances' as he directed their progress.
 They climbed some crazy stairs, for which their escort apologized, and entered a not unpleasant looking room, with bright decorations and tables arranged round the walls adorned with colored lampshades. There was a small orchestra in one corner, an eager little manager, who approved of the appearance of Paul's guests, and insisted upon shaking hands with them, and several competent-looking waiters. They had their choice of tables, and Paul, who after a controversy with Miss Brown insisted upon being host, ordered a simple supper. Then he rose to his feet.
 "Will you dance with me, please," he begged Frances, "before the people come? It would give me great pleasure. Miss Brown will excuse me, I know. She is so good-natured."

News of the Mines

AROUND PRINCE RUPERT
Georgia River and Mountain Boy Continue Winter Work; Ruby Silver On Blackhill; Texas Creek Region Active

At the Georgia River Gold Mines on Portland Canal operations are proceeding on a winter basis with a crew of some fifteen men at the mine. In spite of recent ten below zero weather with a high wind, there has been no delay in the work, which speaks well for the efficiency of the plant and the manner of its installation. Work is confined just now to driving the No. 3 level north and that level has now reached a point 200 feet below the most important high-grade surface outcrops. The structure indicates a northerly pitch to that shoot of ore and, in its northern extension, the drift is encountering lenses of well mineralized quartz of the same type as that at the surface. Beyond the present face of the tunnel, the vein has been proven on the surface by numerous open cuts for a distance of 1500 feet and also by three tunnels, No. 1 tunnel attaining a depth of 125 feet on the vein and proving an average gross value of $35 per ton. No. 3 level will command an average depth of 425 feet below the 1500 feet surface outcrops. Richard Bosence, well known Stewart miner and prospector, is foreman in charge of work at the mine, and in charge at the beach is Harold Beaton, son of Wellington Beaton, president of the company. R. G. Mellin, general superintendent in charge, has left for Vancouver to spend the holidays.

Winter operations are continuing at the Mountain Boy mine on American Creek in the Stewart district. Forty-five tons of fuel oil were recently unloaded at Stewart and taken by Ernie Armstrong's pack trains to the mine. The shipment consisted of 200 drums and the job of transporting it over the rough trail to the mine was no easy one.

With 150 feet yet to go before the intersection being driven for is arrived at, the tunnel on the Blackhill Mining Co.'s property at Stewart last week broke into a second ore shoot in which ruby silver and argenteite indicated to be predominant. Assays revealed a silver content of 165 ounces, accompanied by .10 ounce of gold and an appreciable amount of lead. With the installation of an ore car and track, the tunnel is now being pushed ahead much more rapidly and with such good results that a large commercial ore body at the intersection of the tunnel with the main vein system is anticipated. The present work is already advanced 125 feet giving 60 feet of backs and, at the intersection, 125 feet. There is now four feet of snow at the property, work on which is in charge of John Haathi, well known pioneer Stewart mining man.

Mining on the Alaskan side of the international boundary in the Portland Canal region has received quite a filip during the past few weeks with the taking over by substantial outside interests of three prominent Texas Creek properties—the Silver Bell ground on Texas Creek, the Lemmons and Thornton property near the head of the creek and the Metcalf and Finley property on banded Mountain, between Texas Creek and the Chickamin glacier. The Silver Bell group has been taken under option by the Cantu Mining Co., of which Conrad Wolfe is the moving spirit. According to E. D. Haddon, Hyder banker and secretary and director of the Cantu, fast development work on the property is planned and an active program will be commenced as soon as weather conditions permit. A horse trail will be run to the high-grade showings with a view to making shipments of high-grade ore from time to time while deeper development is in progress. The option taken by the Cantu Co. extends over a period of two years and involves a cash payment of $10,000 and deferred payments deferred over the option period. The Silver Bell, one of the most promising properties in the lower section of the Texas Creek area, includes a total of five claims and adjoins the well known Homestake group. It is fortunately located only a short distance from the projected Texas Creek highway and presents little in the way of transportation difficulties. The group is owned by Joseph Connors, pioneer prospector, who has opened up several of the more important surface showings sufficient to indicate the existence of extensive ore bodies. At least one of the veins is of high-grade character and has yielded assays across the vein ranging from $41.44 to $77 per ton, while the average of four samples across the vein was $63.56. The ore is primarily lead but also contains copper and silver in important amounts. The average of copper content of the four samples was $7.90 and silver averaged $5.98 with 86c in gold. The main vein ranges from two to three feet in width and has been traced for a considerable distance.
