Mrs. Woodrow Wilson Writes of War Years in United States Capital

WASHINGTON, Dec. 17: (CP)-For 18 years the handsome widow of Woodrow Wilson has been a phantom-like figure in the capital. She lives on S Street in the reserved. Georgian town house in which the President died. She goes out to see a few friends but they know they shouldn't invite her unless the party is to very small and very ex-

Occasionally Mrs. Wilson has appeared at a rally of Democratic women, wearing great, butterfly-like orchids, the kind President Wilson showered on her during their courtship. She has never, even by a simple "yes" or "no," revealed what the Wilsons, mister and missus, thought during the turbulent war years in the White House. But she is breaking that 18-year silence. She has written a book.

It was done all in long hand in her quiet study where a picture of Wilson looks down on her. She wrote so well that she turned in three times as much as the publishers could use. So Pulitzer-prizewinner Marquis James was called in to edit the copy.

Those in the know say the book will throw new light on several of Wilson's acts as President. The reminiscences will run in part in a magazine and appear in book form in the early spring.

Not in modern times, at least, has a former First Lady written memoirs of her life as a President's

Mrs. Wilson hasn't changed from the days when she appeared occasionally in public riding with her husband in his last, lingering illness. She is a large, erect woman, with hair almost white. In her face one reads few of her thoughts. There's a Queen Mary-ish air about her black clothes and her hats.

She lives with her two brothers and entertains at small teas and luncheons for a small group of friends who are so respectful of her wish for retirement that many even deny knowing her. Mostly they're old time Democrats who surrounded her husband in office.

Mrs. Wilson never seems to expect any special attentions. She never stands on her dignity. On her chauffeur's days off she walks over to the nearest bus line and drops her dime into the fare box.
