BECOMING A HABIT

This making of speeches relating to international politics is becoming a habit. Statesmen take it in turns to address the world and their words are listened to with eagerness. Almost every radio in the country is put into service when Hitler, Mussolini, Chamberlain or Roosevelt give an important address. However, we are gradually getting used to hearing the voices of these men and they do not stir us as they did. As time goes on we shall take less and less notice of what they say.
