AXIS FORCES SURROUNDED

CAIRO-Main Axis and British forces established contact south of Gazala in Libya today but there has been no decisive result as yet. British troops, outflanking the enemy, have reached a point thirty miles west of Gazala which is forty miles beyond Tobruk. The British armored forces have surrounded all General Rommell's Nazi tank units, it is said. General Rommell is evidently trying to keep up a delaying action so his forces may escape to the Mediterranean, thus possibly marking the "beginning of the end" for the Axis in that area.

Much Too Trusting . . .

Both the British and American people seem to have been much too trusting prior to the entry of Japan into the war. They believed the Japanese just as Mr. Chamberlain previously believed the Germans. Evidently they took too many chances. When it comes to ending the war there must be less trusting in the word of the enemy. We must take no chances on people who have shown that they have no respect for the truth.
