DAILY EDITION

Developing many angles of secret service and espionage into an intriguing story which seems to parallel remarkably the recent Dieppe raid on the continent although the production is said to have actually antedated that event, "Next of Kin," a talking picture document of outstandingly instructive character with particular bearing on the subject of security and importance of restraint in talking of military matters, has been shown before the forces in this area during the past week or so.

For a long time it has been sought to secure equitable representation of the electorate in the House of Commons. It has been no problem in the Senate because that body is not concerned with the popular vote, nor even with sectional representation since the British North America Act of 1867 assigned 24 members to the three Maritime Provinces, 24 each to Quebec and Ontario, and 24 to the four Western Provinces, making 96 members. But it has been a different story in the House of Commons and it has never really ceased to vex, more so now than at any previous period of our history. Quebec has its present fixed representation of 65 members. New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have their present representation of ten and four members respectively since a constitutional amendment allows them to have no fewer number than in the Senate regardless of population. The rest of the provinces can have their present representation in the next Parliament. But, under the usual past procedure of redistribution. the law implies that the 17 members from Manitoba and 21 from Saskatchewan would be decreased by three and four seats respectively.
