Short Cut For Beating Japs ...

Even if Russia fails to give us access to Vladivostok, Siberia, only 650 miles from Tokyo, there is still one realistic short cut that we may use in defeating Japan, Martin Agronsky, correspondent who has coast. covered the war on every continent, declares in the current issue of American Magazine.

"If our naval forces felt strong enough to sail boldly from Hawaii and Midway against Wake and Truk or felt able to descend from the north on the Kuriles for a crack at the northernmost tip of Japan itself," Agronsky states, "the main Japanese fleet would be forced to decisive battle. It has been for some time the strategy of our fleet to bring the Japs into a major engagement. The Japs have refused to accept our challenge. This is because a defeat of the main Japanese naval force would mean disaster for the island nation.

"It is reckoned today that we have at least parity with the Japanese in naval strength," he continues. "Our far superior warship-building capacity may soon give us naval superiority. This superiority would be immeasurably increased by the defeat of the Axis in Europe. The combined Anglo-American fleets, in that case, could turn on Japan. So in a deliberately provoked major naval engagement can also be seen a road to victory." Agronsky then declares that the Russians, in holding Vladivostok, have "one real short cut to Japan, and it may not be permanently denied to us. Our admirals," he adds, "if they wish to adopt a bold, aggressive, and admittedly risky strategy of carrying the war directly to the enemy, hold in their Agronsky reports that General Douglas Mac-Arthur, at his first press conference in Australia in March, 1942, told-off the record-his ideas on the most effective way to beat the Japs. "His ideas rank as military secrets," Agronsky says. "That goes too for the ideas of all our own and the Allied military chiefs. But without revealing our plan of campaign, it is still possible to present both the problem we face in defeating and eventually invading Japan, and the likely solution to that problem."

Aside from carrying the war directly to the Jananese navy, Agronsky says that there are only two other courses open to the United Nations. They are:

First, the Pacific Island possessions of the Japs can be taken one by one, as has been done in the Southwest Pacific. and in addition, push the Japs back from Burma step by step.

hands the other short cut."

Second. air power can be used to destroy Nipponese industrial centres, such as was done on a minor scale in bombing Tokyo in May. 1942 but, before this can be really effective. Agronsky declares that the United Nations must either get land air bases much closer to industrial Japan, continually risk a large fleet of aircraft carriers, or develop much longerrange bombers.

Agronsky reports that under present strategic conditions, the major objective is to nihhle off the Pacific Islands one by one, and to push the Japanese back through Burma and China. with the object of gaining land air bases close enough to launch a major attack on Japanese industrial centres.

This strategy envisions a long war against Japan, Agronsky reports. He points out that one Chinese official has said it will take five years to get enough war materials into China to launch a major offensive, even after Burma falls, but that General Arhold, chief of U.S. Air Forces, has shown that American transport planes, now supplying China with as much material as she ever received over the Burma Road, are transporting these materials on a greatly increased scale.

The right to compete in the football play-offs was gained by the Air Force soccer team which chalked up a 2 to 0 victory over Reserves in a suddendeath game at Acropolis Park last night.

Triumph proved costly for the Airmen, however, for they lost the services of halfback Cruickshanks who suffered a fractured arm during the tilt.

Goal-getters for the winners were Kerr and Mansen. The former scored a penalty shot late in the first half while the latter received a corner kick by Melville and booted the ball through the Reserves' posts in drive was boosted. the second half.
