of Great Britain and President R lin D. Roosevelt of the United States men of great breadth of vision-are evidently, in perfect unanimity on the future course of action after Yalta to pursue the war to its speedy victorious completion and to bring about a just, lasting and guaranteed peace. If there is anything enigmatic about where Russia stands in the matter, we at least have the assurance of Churchill and Roosevelt that Joseph Stalin and the Soviet will march forward in support of the same broad principles as Great Britain and the United States.

Definite and decisive measures were determined upon by the Big Three. They reached settlements on tical problems and agreed to back the implementation of measures which they deemed in their good judgment and common accord to be fair to friend and foe alike with even the might of joint force if deemed necessary to keep international law and order.

There may be features of the Yalta agreements which at first we may not like but accept compromise we all must if we are to reach mutual under--standing on future courses of joint action. Even in victory there must be give and take. The trouble with a lot of us still is that we want to have the most of the taking and the least of the giving—even if it is nothing more than the credit.

......If we could only get above our shallow thoughts and prejudices to see the other fellow's point of view and adjust ourselves accordingly, as we expect him to do, we would have gone a long way towards bringing about the lasting peace. Unwillingness or failure to do this is the seed which germinates through growing differences into future wars. Churchill and Roosevelt tell us that the Yalta decisions have been based on the greatest good for the greater number. Before we criticize any of those decisions we should be conscientiously satisfied without prejudice that they are really not satisfactory.

We say this with no thought of political implications. We are concerned at the moment with the magnificent spirit of co-operation shown throughout the war by the ranks of labor, the keenest management, our Government officials and representatives of the people in municipal councils, legislatures or Cabinets.

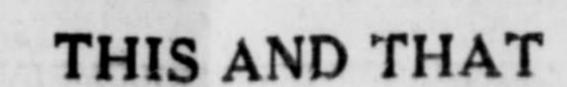

That is not to say that mistakes have not been made. Many times have indications of political expediency shown themselves. To some extent this is not to be wondered at. It is merely human—even if sometimes base— to use means at hand to make weak spots appear strong. The meanest form of such expediency, to our mind, is when resort is had to deceit and falsehood, sometimes plausibly disguised as truth.

Fortunately our democratic state has within itself a sturdy bulwark certain perplexing diplomatic and poli- against any retrograde tendency of human weakness. The secret of the ballotbox, when disclosed after periodic elections, offers the result of the thinking of the people.
