It had been previously reported that leaders of the Moslem League and Congress parties were deadlocked over distribution of seats in the ViceRoy's council.

Indian Proposals

When the Cripps offer of selfgovernment for India was made in March 1942, there were some who regarded it as a concession unwillingly offered by the British at a moment of military crisis. The proposals made on June 14 show how mistaken these critics were. The new proposals are made at a time when Burma has been liberated, the military threat to India has been completely removed, and Britain no longer has a powerful enemy on her doorstep. They are offered, as L. S. Amery, Secretary of State for India, said, "in the hour of victory as a recognition of our good will to India."

Like the proposals for Burma published four weeks previously, the Indian offer provides for an interim government until self-government is initiated under a new constitution drawn up by the Indian parties themselves. But India will at once take several long steps towards Dominion status. Except for the Commander-in-Chief who must be British so long as the defense of India remains a British responsibility, all members of the Viceroy's executive council will be Indians. What is perhaps most significant is that they will not be the arbitrary choice of the Viceroy, but will be drawn by him exclusively from lists of leaders of Indian political life submitted by the leaders of Indian parties.

The relations between the British Government and the Indian Government are also to be brought into line with the practice in the Dominions. In India the Viceroy has represented both the King and the British Government with the result that matters which the British Government wished to take up with the Indian Government had to be presented by someone who is himself the head of the Indian Government. In a Dominion, there is a Governor-General who represents the King and is part of the Dominion Government (and acts upon the advice of Ministers responsible to the Dominion Parliament) while the British Government is represented by a High Commissioner. Under the new proposals, a High Commissioner will be appointed for India.
