The British Election . . .

As Conservatives see it, social progress versus socialization is the major issue in Britain's forthcoming general election.

"I am as much opposed to the creation of a complete socialist system as I am in favor of immense social reforms, in many of which a free British nation has long led the world," Prime Minister Winston Churchill declared in his second election radiocast. And this is the keynote of the campaign which the Conservative Party is waging against its strongest opponent, the Labor Party.

Mr. Churchill and his party colleagues are fighting in the election under a national banner. It might as well be said frankly that this is mainly a bit of election tactics, and that certainly the great mass of voters in Britain realize their choice lies between Conservatives and Socialists-with the Liberals as an alternative but hardly a major contestant.

The basis of Mr. Churchill's "four years' plan" which could be summed up in three words - food, work, homes-includes far-reaching measures of social reform.

Already drastic changes liberaliizing Britain's educational system have been put on the statute books, and an advanced scheme for family allowances has been enacted into law. Conservatives pledge themselves to complete these measures by having put through a social insurance bill based on the Beveridge scheme, as well as a national health service plan, and other reforms. They, like the Socialists, undertake to maintain full employment.

Thus British Conservatives advocate a program of extensive social reforms and are prepared to intervene in business and in the daily living of the ordinary citizen to the extent necessary to achieve these re-to controls in general, however. In particular, they oppose the Labor Party's program calling for immediate nationalization of some industries, such as transport, coal mines, and insurance, as well as ultimate nationalization of the land itself.

This issue of nationalization or not is likely to be the one upon which the election turns-not so much in its theoretical implications as in the reaction of the average man and woman voter from the effects of five years of wartime controls.

Neither party denies the necessity for continuation of a certain amount of control in view of the vast difficulties and problems still confronting the nation after the end of hostilities in Europe.

Housing alone is a tremendous problem affecting many millions of people, and Mr. Churchill in his latest radiocast declared he would not hesitate "to use wartime expedients" to meet Britain's crying need for houses to replace those destroyed by German bombs.

On the whole, however, the Conservatives contend that the enormous task of reconstruction in Britain should be left to private enterprise and controls kept to an indispensable minimum. Indeed, although Mr. Churchill and his Cabinet advocate and will, in fact, carry out almost revolutionary social reforms if elected, there is a strong minority within the ranks of the Conservative Party, including a number of members of Parliament, who are genuine Tories.

These men are convinced that social coddling of the masses is bad for the nation. This group, though it does not frame party policy, is influential enough to affect the emphasis with which it is carried out.

The result is that when it comes to applying election programs te concrete problems of reconstruction there will be a big difference, both of tone and timing, between the Conservatives and Labor.

There will be, perhaps, an even greater difference in the international sphere than on domestic issues. Mr. Churchill in his recent radiocast emphasized that "first of all we have to do our duty to the utmost in the war against Japan." Both parties are agreed on this. It is a plank in both election platforms. Yet arguments are being used on the Conservative side that it would be unwise for wartime reasons to change horses in midstream.

Changing World Strategy-

HELPING GOD'S PURPOSE PRACTICAL WAY TO LAY FOUNDATION FOR PEACE

"Today it is vital to reshape our world strategy because at least three world-wide revolutionary changes are taking place in our time," declared Prof. Basil Matthews, director of Union Theological Seminary, Vancouver, at a well-attended meeting last night in First Presbyterian Church. HUMAN HAIR SOURCE OF VALUABLE FOOD

LONDON, June 25 (P) Human hair is being converted into a valuable food which gives life and strength to premature babies or under-nourished grown-ups.

Galled cystine, the food, is manufactured at the Ashe Laboratories in London and C. R. G. Young, the director, said it comes from the sweepings from barber shops. It has been used in food sent to the starving people of Europe and the French government is producing it to give to returning French prisoners of war.

"Although any hair will do, we prefer women's hair as there is less cleaning to be done than for the men's hair from barbers' sweepings," Young said. A research chemist, F. B. Barmoy, said the main use of cystine will probably be in medicines. It also is used as a predigested food injected ito the blood stream.
