The prespect developed that the meagre coal rations for British homes might fall even lower next month because of efforts to re-open factories closed by the fuel shortage.

A spokesman for the Ministry of Fuel and Power said that household fuel stocks were down to a two-week's supply in northed for more than ern England and Scotland. Weather in Britain continued cold but fairly clear. Railwaymen were reported hauling 500,-000 tons of coal from the pitheads daily while miners, augmented by volunteers, fought tough conditions to dig coal.

The Premier's Policy

AS WAS TO BE EXPECTED, Premier Hart has A called upon the Legislature to ratify the apparently completely satisfactory agreement on Dominion-provincial tax privileges which he recently negotiated at Ottawa. The arrangement, terms of which are already the basis of agreements which are proving acceptable to five other provinces, has been given general public approval and it is to be expected that the Legislature will accede to Mr. Hart's request and officially ratify it. Then the revenue structure of the province will be stabilized for another five-year period and the government will be able to get along with its major projected undertakings, some of the more important of which have already been outlined.

Another feature of Premier Hart's policy speech is the reiteration of intention to extend the Eastern Railway into the Peace River country in order to exploit the natural resources of the area and bring them more directly tributary to British Columbia through the central interior than they are at present. But this, the Premier again points out, is contingent upon co-operation of federal government but, with the increase in ur-

that time onward the indus-

Capital flowed into the Do-

Free Trade

OLITICAL CONTROVERSY is like perpetual motionit never stops. At least that is so in democratic countries where men are free to discuss, criticize and change thes policy of governments. Free trade has long been a popular bone of political con-

Under certain conditions a may with advantage open its doors to Free Trade while other nations put up barriers of protection. This was so in England in the middle of the nineteenth century when Corn Laws were abolished and free competition of foreign goods with home goods was permitted in the home markets. The argument in its favor at that time was that the industrial interests of a country were best served by allowing capital to flow into those channels of trade natural to the character and resources of the country and also by bringing the consumer as near as possible to the cheapest producer.

But at the close of the nineteenth century the policy of Free Trade began to be unpopular in Britain, chiefly as a result of the "dumping" of German-made goods on the home market, without equal freedom for British goods entering Germany. And so the was raised, "No Free Trade without Reciprocity." In the early years of the twentieth century Joseph Chamberlain launched his campaign for protection against the dumping of foreign goods, which, he contended, was putting British industries; out of business and men out of work. Chamberlain's policy was rejected in a general election, and a Liberal government was returned to power on the Free Trade ticket.

Chamberlain, who had been the political hero of the Boer War, was tumbled from his

Rewards of Work LEN may not live by bread alone, but still less can they live by paper dollars. says Prof. J. L. McDougall of Queen's University in a dissertation against excessive taxation. They eat bread which was the result of labor. They wear clothes. They live in houses. Everything they use, everything they consume is the result of thought, of planning and of effort. If we are to live well in a world organized upon free co-operation we must be willing to let those who work reap the rewards of their effort. If we as a nation insist upon trying to erect greed, envy, and jealousy into the primary maxims of public policy we shall be driven by the inexorable logic of our own position into using compulsion in order to realize our aims. And down that road lie all the horrors of the totalitarian state-and all its economic wastes as well. Freedom has not only been Increased Rates and industrial production reached great heights and the volume of traffic was unprecedented, higher-rated traffic such as manufactured commodities and materials of war made up a very much greater part of the total traffic than is normally the case. Cars were more heavily loaded both because of the necessity for so doing and because of the volume of goods being shipped by individual consigners. Maximum loading was required under the orders of the Transport Controller and full co-operation extended by the shippers motivated, no doubt to a large extent, by patriotism and knowledge of the car shortage. Likewise the movement of the war traffic frequently required longer hauls, much traffic being moved to dockside from distant points. As a result of these various features, the railways were operating under very favorable circumstances from financial point of view and railway operating revenues were greatly increased and maximum loading and slower schedules resulted in a more economical transportation of the traffic.

We of this generation can live as well as we do because of the long-continued constructive efforts of those who preceded us, their careful saving and their wise use of those savings. They were enabled so to do because society was ready to permit those who produced and who wished to save to enjoy the fruit of those savings. That age saw what we have almost forgotten, that men may be brought to courses which produce socially desirable results by appealing to their self-regarding impulses.

The proofs stand out around us in wasted opportunities and in lost production that men still ask to see gains for themselves and their families before they will work with intelligence and persistence; and productivity is impossible without them.

Suffering from a broken leg, the result of having been kicked by his horse last Friday afternoon, Peter Calder, chief of the Greenville (Kitlakdamiks) tribe of Naas River Indians, is resting comfortably today in the Prince Rupert General Hospital where his condition is reported good. Why is there still a shortage?

Part of the answer is that Canadians have more money to spend. Then, too, there are the returned service men, many of them starting or re-establishing homes of their own.

Another part of the answer is that many Canadian industries which use cotton in their products are again gathering momentum on civilian supplies and are building up their working inventories. Meanwhile our 10,000 workers are doing their utmost to catch up on both civilian and industrial demands.

As long as the present tremendous demands and relative shortages continue, we shall go on distributing our products on a quota basis.

The prodigious task of taking inventory of the millions of dollars in Nazi loot, found in such concentration camps as Buchenwald, Dachau and others, has been assigned to the foreign exchange depository, a branch of the finance division of OMGUS. Under the direction of Col. William G. Brey, of San Francisco, General Staff Corps, the treasure that failed to conquer the world is being evaluated. It is estimated that the total value of all material housed here will run into the hundreds of milions. At right, Hagosp Gamirian, Armenian-French jeweler, employed by the U.S. as a technical expert to appraise stones and gold, is shown inspecting a bag of semi-precious and glass imitation stones. The bag had previously been inspected for diamonds. At left, Pte. John Long, Co. 1, 18th Infantry, of Chillicothe, Ohio, guards bullion in the "silver room." The total value of wire, sheets, coin, bullion in this room is estimated at about $2,200,000.
